

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 14, 1866.

THE doctrine that an infant is not liable on a contract entered into by him during infancy, except for necessities, unless such contract be confirmed by him after he has attained the age of twenty-one years, is constantly before the Courts; but the question is always raised under the exception to the rule. The whole difficulty that arises turns on the meaning of the word "necessaries;" and the question, what are or are not necessities, depending, as it does, entirely on the varied conditions and circumstances of the infant, will and must often be under consideration. The list of necessities has lately received a new and important addition, in the case of Helps and Another v. Clayton, decided by the Court of Common Pleas in Michaelmas Term last, and reported 10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1184. The decision in that case may be considered to have still further developed the doctrine as to the liability of infants for what constitute necessities. It establishes the principle, that in some cases, and under particular circumstances, not only articles of bodily sustenance, education, personal ornaments, convalescent expenses, but even the costs of obtaining a legal assurance of a suitable provision for life, may be construed to be a necessary, for which an infant will be liable. In Helps and Another v. Clayton an action was brought to recover the amount of a solicitor's bill of costs for preparing a marriage settlement; and although the question the Court decided was, to some extent, one of fact, the Court being at liberty to draw inferences of fact, yet the judgment of the Court must be taken to decide a question of law; for although the question, whether articles supplied to an infant are necessities, is one for the jury to decide, yet they are to do so under the guidance of the Court, by rules already laid down in numerous decisions. The Court, in Helps and Another v. Clayton, decided that a marriage settlement may be a necessary for an infant, and was so on the facts stated for the opinion of the Court in that case. The question in such cases, turning, as it does, on the status of the infant, a marriage settlement will certainly be held in future, on the authority of that case, to be a very common necessary for an infant. The facts in Helps and Another v. Clayton were shortly as follows:—The plaintiffs were solicitors practising at Gloucester, where the lady's father, Captain Somerset, resided. They had before been employed by Captain Somerset. In August, 1862, the defendant, being engaged to be married to Captain Somerset's daughter, who was at that time an infant under twenty-one years of age, Captain Somerset called on the plaintiffs, with a letter from the defendant to him, containing certain proposals for a settlement, and instructed the plaintiffs to prepare settlements, and named a trustee on behalf of the lady. Some communication took place between the plaintiffs and the defendant's solicitors, as to whose duty it was to prepare the deeds, but in the end the settlements were prepared by the plaintiffs, and were executed both by the lady and the defendant. The marriage took place, and the defendant afterwards refusing to pay the costs of preparing the settlements, an action was brought which resulted in a special case, stating the above facts, for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas. The case was argued in the Sittings after Trinity Term, and the Court took time to consider its judgment; and in last Michaelmas Term Mr. Justice Willes delivered the unanimous opinion of the Court, holding that the defendant was liable to pay the costs of the settlement. The Court of Common Pleas expressly held that the husband is liable to reimburse the expenses of the settlement, which the lady, her father, or person standing in loco parentis may have incurred. Mr. Justice Willes puts the decision upon this ground as distinguished from the ground of any express agency, in support of which the facts supplied some evidence. Mr. Justice Willes observes in the course of the judgment, "The employment of the lady's solicitor to prepare the settlement is not a mere matter of compliment or patronage: it has also the substantial object of satisfying the lady's friends that all proper care has been exercised on her behalf by some person in whom they confide, and of giving a remedy for negligence by action against the solicitor." As to the power of an infant to enter into such a contract, Mr. Justice Willes goes on to say, "The principal contract of marriage was one which it was competent for an infant to enter upon. She had no property to settle, and would have had no certain provision without the settlement; and the preparation of the settlement was, therefore, beneficial, as securing to her at her election a proper provision, which may justly be considered a necessary suitable to her estate and condition." Certain articles have been held to be necessities: meat, drink, wearing apparel, lodgings, medical advice, and medicine, are beyond all doubt necessities for which an infant will always be held liable; but the term "necessaries" is not confined in all cases to such matters as are positively required for the infant's bodily sustenance. A suit of livery for the servant of an infant, who was a captain in the army, was held to be a necessary for which the infant was liable. (Vide Hands v. Slaney, 8 T. R. 578). So, too, a gold watch and breast-pin have been held to be necessities for an undergraduate at a university, who was the eldest son of a member of Parliament, and a gentleman of fortune. (Peters v. Fleming, 6 M. & W. 42). So, where an infant was an invalid, and horse or carriage exercise was recommended by a medical man, and was resorted to by the infant, for the restoration of his health, these were held to be necessities for which the infant, having contracted, was bound to pay. (Hart v. Prater, 1 Jur. 623). We cite these cases to shew the extent to which the Courts have gone in deciding what are or are not necessities. It would be hopeless to attempt to define any list of articles which are or are not necessities. Many articles obviously unnecessary in the case of most infants, have been held to be necessities under certain circumstances. Indeed, until each separate want has received a judicial decision, a tradesman supplies a minor with articles beyond those required for bodily sustenance at his peril. Of course, we speak beside the question of agency, as in the case of infants who reside under the parental roof. They are supplied on the principle of agency. They are supposed to have a right to pledge the parent's credit for necessities, though the fact that the articles supplied are necessities is not conclusive of the authority. So, in the case of a feme covert residing with her husband, who is also considered, for many purposes, the agent of the husband to contract for the supply to her of articles necessary for her condition in life; but this principle rests entirely on what authority she may have, a married woman having no authority by virtue of marriage to pledge her husband's credit. Yet both in the case of an infant living with his parent, and a wife residing with her husband, a much wider power to contract would probably be held to be authorised, especially if the parent or husband respectively was aware that such articles had been supplied. No doubt, in Helps and Another v. Clayton, if the marriage had never taken place, the defendant would not have been liable at law to pay the costs of preparing the settlements. Probably Captain Somerset would have been liable, he having expressly employed the plaintiffs to prepare the deeds; indeed, an action was commenced against Captain Somerset. The case can hardly amount to a decision that a husband is liable at common law to pay for his wife's marriage settlement, but practically he will be held, wherever there is a settlement, liable to pay the costs; because the decision does amount to this—that the contract is for the benefit of the wife; and if the marriage afterwards takes place, and the costs be not paid before marriage, the husband will be liable on the contract of the wife entered into before marriage; and that, as the case expressly decides, though the wife was an infant when the contract was entered into, it being for the benefit of the wife, and in most cases, where there is any property to form the subject of settlement, the infant will be liable on the contract, and consequently the husband, for the contract entered into by his wife dum sola, if the action be brought during the coverture.

In ordinary experience, every married man in the wealthy ranks of society is practically well acquainted with the professional rule, that the lady's solicitor prepares the settlement, and the husband pays the costs of such preparation. We may look upon the case as an important decision, that if a marriage settlement be suitable to the rank and condition of an infant, he or she, whichever the case may be, is liable on such a contract as on a contract for a necessary; and if the infant be a woman who afterwards marries, the husband is liable as on a contract entered into by his wife whilst sole, and on which he would, of course, be liable on marriage. Courts of equity have for many years upheld the settlements of personal estate of infants under age, and in the case of female infants, on the principle, that the settlement was the settlement of the husband, the object being to cut down the interest of the husband. Courts of equity having, therefore, expressly held the validity of a contract embodied in a deed of settlement, and held it binding, though it probably, in most cases, would be personally not beneficial directly to the settlor, as operating to cut down his or her interest. It would seem, therefore, to follow, that if the substance of such a contract is binding on an infant on the equity side of Westminster Hall, the costs incurred in creating such a contract should be held to be a necessary on the common-law side. Lastly, we may observe, that stat. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 43, enables an infant, with the approbation of the Court of Chancery, to make a binding settlement, even of real estate. We have said the decision is important, as adding another judicial authority to guide us as to what are or are not necessities for an infant. In practice a husband will, in almost every case where there is a settlement, be liable to pay the costs of the settlement prepared by the wife's solicitor, whether incurred with his express authority or not; and that the practice, which is almost universal, for the wife's solicitor to prepare, and the husband to pay the costs, has received, if not quite judicial authority, at all events judicial notice, and express sanction and approval. This will be satisfactory to solicitors, and will, as Mr. Justice Willes observes, render "the employment of the lady's solicitor not a mere compliment or matter of patronage." The case, at all events, decides, "that a settlement, which affords a provision for an infant, who on her marriage had no other certain provision, is a necessary."

Reviews.

A Compendium of the Law of Real and Personal Property connected with Conveyancing, designed as a comprehensive Record Book for Students, and a Digest of the most useful Learning for Practitioners. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B. C. L., Q. C. Editor of Fearn's "Contingent Remainders" and "Miford's Chancery Pleadings." Author of "a Manual of Equity," "a Manual of Common Law," and "a Manual of Bankruptcy," and one of the Consolidators of the Chancery Orders. Third Edition. 8vo., pp. 1322.

[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes.]

A LEARNED but in this instance ill-informed contemporary has committed the ludicrous blunder of confounding Josiah W. Smith, Q. C., author of a sufficient number of "Manuals," with James Walter Smith, LL.D., author of an insufferable number of "Hand-books," and now better known as Müller (or to adopt our contemporary's more appropriate spelling, Muller) Smith, but no more like the author of the work before us, than he to John William Smith. Such accidents are inevitable in so large a family. It is time that the Legislature took the Smiths in hand for their own good, and dealt with their name as it once dealt with that of the McGregors. Not that an absolute proscription is necessary—a double income tax on every male that signeth Smith, Brown, or anything ending in —son, with free liberty to change to Herbert, Llanover, or De Vere, or any other name in or out of the court guide, would do the business.

A compiler, working on Mr. Smith's plan of laying all the text-writers under contribution, could hardly fail to collect a large quantity of useful matter, and, by arranging it conveniently, and adding a full index, to make a useful book of reference. This, Mr. Smith has done; and though, by giving the enactments which come within the scope of his work, for the most part at full length, he has occupied much space that might have been better filled with less accessible matter (for have we not Welby's Chitty and Shelford?), he has not altogether failed of making his book "a digest of the most useful learning for practitioners."

But to the title of "a comprehensive second book for students" it has no claim. It is a collection of abridged extracts or summaries from a variety of sources, which may have passed through the collector's mind, but have not been refashioned by it, and have brought nothing from it; so they remain a lifeless collection of fragments, put together in tolerable order, but not coherent. Such books can never be readable, and are not for students. Even the collection or arrangement of the subjects is often rather in accordance with words than with ideas. Thus, after having in Part I treated "of the several kinds of things constituting the subjects of conveyancing," the author proceeds in Part II to consider "the several kinds of interests constituting the subjects of conveyancing," and this is divided into ten titles:—1. Conditions and limitations on which interests depend, or by which they may be affected. 2. Freehold as distinguished from copyhold interests. 3. Copyhold interests. 4. Interests of freehold duration, and first of freeholds of inheritance. 5. Freeholds not inheritance. 6. Estates or interests less than freehold. 7. Estates or interests in severalty and in community. 8. Legal and equitable interests. 9. Interests clothed with the ownership and interests collateral to the ownership (subdivided into vested and executory interests—rights of equity or action, mere possibilities, mere adverse possessions and expectancies—powers and charges on lien). 10. Absolute and defeasible interests, and particularly interests by way of security (subdivided into absolute and defeasible interests, mortgages and interests under statutes, judgments, &c.) This is obviously not a natural arrangement.

The first title is subdivided into seven chapters:—

"1. Of the several kinds of conditions. 2. Of special or collateral limitations and conditional limitations. 3. Of the performance of conditions. 4. Of taking advantage of the breach of conditions. 5. Of void conditions and limitations. 6. Of the period to which the event of death, when mentioned in conditional language, as if it were a contingent event, is to be referred. 7. Of conditions generally." Here the 5th and 6th sub-heads are entirely out of place. Conditions may be void because they involve something which is immoral or contrary to public policy or is expressly prohibited by statute; but that is an accident in no way peculiar to conditions. What would avoid a condition would equally avoid a contract, a conveyance, or a trust. As to the 5th sub-head, "Of the period to which death is to be referred," it is obviously an isolated chapter on the construction of instruments. Again: the consideration of mortgages, if they are referred, as our author refers them, to the head of defeasible interests, ought not to be separated from that of conditions; while if they are regarded as securities for debts, they ought to be included in the third part of the book, where the administration of assets and priorities are treated of. In this third part, "Of the title to things constituting the subjects of conveyancing," we find an account of title by descent, but nothing of title by marriage. Title to real estate by marriage is treated of in Part II (devoted to estates and interests), under the heads of "dower" and "curtesy;" and title to personal estate by marriage in Part IV, among miscellaneous heads of law. These faults of arrangement do not much affect the utility of the book for reference, but they mar it as an institutional work.

THE CONCENTRATION OF THE COURTS AND OFFICES OF LAW IN LONDON.

THE council of the Association for the Promotion of Social Science has published an address to the members of both branches of the Legislature, the municipal corporations of England and Wales, and the chambers of commerce, in connexion with the association, as well as others, "in favour of the two Government bills for purchasing a site for and erecting new law courts." Why the municipal corporations and chambers of commerce should be specially addressed on this subject is not apparent. Possibly the council of the association has private information that a good many of those bodies have plenty of leisure to attend to the affairs of other people.

The address, however, will do good, by furnishing to every one who takes an interest in the matter, a compendious account of the main features of the Government scheme. A rather indifferent plan of the site, and of the legal neighbourhood as far as Somerset House, accompanies the address. "Carey Street site" is thus described in the address:—

"It may be described, in general terms, as being bounded on the north by Carey-street, which runs at the bottom of New-square, Lincoln's-inn; on the south it has the main part of its frontage towards the Strand, a small part of it being in Pickett-street, which lies at the back of St. Clement Dane's Church; on the east it has a small street called Bell-yard, which runs parallel with Chancery-lane; and on the west it has for its boundary the walls of St. Clement's-inn. These boundaries inclose an area of seven acres and a half."

After explaining to the uninitiated the legal advantages of this site, the council proceed as follows:—

"The general public advantages offered by this site are equally striking. Situated partly in the city of London and partly in the city of Westminster, so that the structure raised upon it may be regarded as the common property of both, it is the centre of the metropolis which both combine to form; a more exact centre, a better compromise between the city and the west end, could not well be found. Every suburb has ready and constant access to it—by the Strand on one side, and Holborn on the other, which are the great arteries of London. A very slight outlay would afford an excellent approach from Holborn, either by the north-eastern or north-western corner of Lincoln's-inn-fields. The Metropolitan Railway in Farringden-street, the London, Chatham, and Dover at Ludgate-hill, the South-eastern at Charing-cross and Cannon-street, and the London and South-western at Waterloo-bridge, all, draining an immense town and suburban district on all sides, bring their passengers within an easy walk. And the approach by river, the sole advantage of this kind which Westminster affords, will be equally afforded here, for the Temple Pier is almost at hand, and may be rendered easily accessible.

"In this commanding position, which, as the Lord Chancellor has observed, seems 'as if created' for the purpose of this great improvement, it is proposed to bring together in one pile of building the superior courts of law and equity, the Probate and Divorce Courts, and the Courts of Admiralty, and all the various offices connected with each of these courts. The broad features of the scheme may be thus outlined:—

"The range of shops extending from Bell-yard, which is on the city side of Temple-bar, extending past Temple-bar along the north side of the Strand to Pickett-court, will be taken down, and the street widened so as to form a becoming approach on the south side.

"A second arch may probably be placed at Temple-bar, which will relieve the serious pressure of traffic so often and so much complained of. Over this double archway it is thought that a passage may be constructed, forming a communication uninterrupted by the traffic of Fleet-street, between the Temple, the new Thames embankment, and the river on the one side, and the new courts, Fleet-street, and the Strand on the other side.

"The buildings forming the western boundary of the narrow and unwholesome alley, called Bell-yard, will, of course, be removed, and this street, as well as Carey-street, will be converted into wide and useful thoroughfares.

"The only opposition to this site has come from the Hon. Society of Lincoln's-inn, who have objected to nothing but the removal of the equity courts from Lincoln's-inn. It is to be observed, with regret, that this opposition was based upon no wider foundation than the personal convenience and personal feeling of the members of this society; and it may be fairly urged upon this head, that even if these objections were well founded, they form no just ground of opposition to a scheme which would so greatly benefit the whole community. The objections, however, are of no weight. No sensible inconvenience will be caused to members of Lincoln's-inn by the transfer of the courts of equity to a spot which is within a stone's throw. No injustice is done to the society by the removal of courts, which exist for the public, from a place where they have been badly housed, to a place where they will prove most for the public good. It should be added, that the feeling of the other Inns of Court is entirely in favour of the proposed bills, and even in Lincoln's-inn it is understood that opinion is divided."

On the important question of the ways and means we have the following statement:—

"The cost of the new courts, including the cost of the site, has been approximately estimated by the officers of the Board of Works at 1,500,000*l.* This it is proposed to raise in the following way:—

"1. The value of the courts and offices at present belonging to the State, and the capitalised value of the rental of the courts and offices now rented by the State which will be set free by their removal to the new courts, and which are taken at 200,000*l.*, are to be paid by the Government.

"2. One million is to be contributed from a fund in the hands of the Court of Chancery, which amounts to 1,291,000*l.* This fund, which is designated as Fund B. in the Report of the Royal Commissioners, has arisen in the following way:—Money deposited by suitors in the hands of the Court of Chancery is only invested for their benefit on their express application. The floating cash balance in the hands of the Accountant-General, and not so invested at the express request of the suitor, is treated as between the suitors and the court as so much cash on a drawing account at a bankers. But as this floating cash balance has always been very large*, the Lord Chancellor, instead of allowing the Bank of England to get the benefit of it, has, since 1793, continually kept the greater part of it invested, under the authority of acts of Parliament, for the benefit of the State. The income from these investments increased, in spite of large payments made from time to time for salaries, compensations, pensions, and the building of new courts and offices, till it amounted to 1,291,000*l.* It was then capitalised, and is the sole and exclusive property of the State, to which no suitor has any claim, except in the remote contingency of a deficiency in realising the investments of floating cash, all of which have been made at an average of 87. Of this fund (which may be concisely described as the banker's profit, made and accumulated by the State under legislative authority, on the guarantee, and at the risk of the public, by investing the floating cash balances left at call by the suitors), it is proposed to devote one million to the building of the new courts.

"It should be added, that one member of the Royal Commission, Vice-Chancellor Wood, differed from his colleagues as to the propriety of resorting to these funds, on the ground, that as they have arisen by a banking profit made out of suitors' cash, the suitors have a moral claim upon them, so far as to require that they should only be applied for their benefit by the reduction of suitors' fees. But even if the validity of the argument be admitted, the objection is answered by the fact, that such an application would be far less advantageous than that recommended by the Royal Commissioners. The application of the million which it is proposed to devote to building the new courts, to the reduction of suitors' fees, would only save them 30,000*l.* a year. But assuming that the annual costs in Chancery are 1,200,000*l.*, the acceleration of the progress of suits only two days in the year, through the proposed concentration, would effect a saving to the suitors of more than 30,000*l.*

"3. The balance of 400,000*l.* is to be advanced out of the Consolidated Fund. This balance is to be lent by the State to the suitor at 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent; but both principal and interest are to be repaid, and the debt extinguished, by the suitors in fifty years, by means of a rent-charge, to be levied by fees on the suitors and proceedings of all courts and offices accommodated at the new buildings, except the Court of Chancery. This court is to be relieved from any rent tax, on the ground that it will have contributed a million out of Fund B. The other rent fees to be paid by the suitors of the other courts will, of course, relieve such suitors from the rent they have now to pay for offices. The redemption annuity thus created is equivalent to a fixed annual rent-charge of 18,000*l.* a year during fifty years, a sum which will be easily levied by a comparatively small rent of courts fee on the proceedings on each of the courts accommodated. For instance, the average number of writs of summons issued in the three superior courts of common law during the years 1859–60–61 was almost exactly 100,000. A fee of only 1*s.* 6*d.* on each writ—an item absolutely inappreciable in the cost of a common-law action—would produce 7500*l.* from the common-law courts alone.

"As a very considerable proportion of the expenses of the new buildings will arise from the necessity for providing an ample depository for wills, not only for London, but for the whole country, it has been suggested, that the proportion of the rent-charge paid by the Probate Court should be equal to that upon the common-law courts, namely, 7500*l.* The total number of probates and letters of administration granted in 1862 exceeded 27,000, and no doubt an average fee of 6*s.* 8*d.*, graduated according to the existing scale of probate duty, upon all probates and letters of administration above 100*l.*, would produce that amount. Of course, these figures are only given by way of suggestion, and merely to shew, that any possible rent tax which will have to be borne by the suitors would be an item of expense scarcely appreciable in comparison with the saving caused by the increased rapidity and efficiency of legislation.

"The fund called Fund B., together with other Chancery funds, is charged with the payment of large outgoings, and it appears, by the returns for 1863, that the income from these sources only exceeded the outgoings by 356*l.* during that year. But these outgoings, to the extent of 53,000*l.* a year, arise from the payment of certain compensation allowances in the nature of terminable annuities payable to the holders of abolished offices of the court. With reference to these compensations, the Government measure proposes to do what it is conceived is but very tardy justice to the equity suitors. The former holders of the offices were what may be called so many pensioners on the suitors, paid, not for services rendered, but for liberty to enter the court in search of justice. A patent office of this sort was in ancient days an approved method of endowing any favourite of the monarch. But as the State created these predatory offices, it should have abolished them at its own expense. Instead of so doing, it has thrown the purchase moneys, to be paid in the shape of the compensation annuities in question, on the suitors of the present generation, by way of life rent, instead of paying the whole, as it clearly should have done, out of the principal of Fund B. This injustice the Money Bill proposes to remedy. The result will, therefore, be, that after the withdrawal of the proposed million of stock, for the purposes of the intended courts, the balance of Fund B. will be applicable to the redemption of the compensation annuities, and an immediate and large reduction will be effected in the taxation of equity suitors."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR AND THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

At the annual meeting of the Nottingham Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Paget, M.P., stated that a short time ago he transmitted to the Lord Chancellor a resolution adopted by the Nottingham Merchant and Traders' Association, thanking him for his efforts towards purifying the administration of the Courts of Bankruptcy. The following was his Lordship's reply:—

"Hackwood Park, Basingstoke.

"My dear Mr. Paget,—There has been no efficient superintendence of the administration of the bankruptcy law. It was the object I principally had in view when I desired to have a chief judge appointed, but which the House of Lords refused. I have endeavoured, but imperfectly, to do the duty myself.

"In doing so it is most painful to see the amount of dishonesty, neglect, and abandonment of duty which has been brought to light.

"But there is one evil in bankruptcy which I cannot reach. It is this:—As soon as a trader has made a bad debt, and the debtor becomes bankrupt, in nineteen cases out of twenty he reasons thus:—'The first loss is the best. If I look after this bankrupt's estate I shall have much trouble, and may incur great expense. I cannot leave my business to attend meetings, and it will not do to employ an attorney. If I did, perhaps I should not get more than an extra shilling in the pound dividend. Therefore, let it take care of itself.' And thus every estate is abandoned to attorneys, brokers, auctioneers, and every description of unnecessary official persons, and is eaten up by their costs and charges. Then comes statements like these:—Assets, 2100*l.*; costs of solicitors and otherwise in bankruptcy, 1200*l.*—more than half the property. Then there is a great outcry, and people say this is the fault of the law and of the Lord Chancellor. I could establish a board of official administration which should be bound to collect and distribute every estate at a maximum charge of 10*l.* or 12*l.* per cent., but were I to propose it I should have the opposition of every solicitor. How is this to be met? Will you talk to your friends on the best remedy for it, and tell me how I can secure the honest, speedy, and efficient collection and distribution of bankrupts' estates?

"Yours, very truly,

"WESTBURY.

"Mr. C. Paget."

At Marlborough-street, Mr. Tyrwhitt gave his judgment in the proceedings against Mr. Strange, of the Alhambra, for a breach of the Theatres Act, by representing ballets on the stage.

Mr. Poland appeared for Mr. Strange, and Mr. Roberts attended for the plaintiffs, Mr. H. Wigan and others.

Mr. Tyrwhitt said—I have considered the evidence, with the statutes and decided cases. The summons charges an offence against the Theatres Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, in keeping the Alhambra, a place of public resort, for the public performance of "stage-plays," without the license of the Lord Chamberlain. And by sect. 23 the word "stage-play" includes, among other dramatic representations, "pantomime or other entertainment of the stage," all of them being illegal in the metropolis without the Lord Chamberlain's license. Now, the Alhambra is admitted to be a place of public resort, unlicensed by the Lord Chamberlain, but licensed for music and dancing by the county justices, under the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36. The facts relied on to support the charge are shortly these:—At the Alhambra, a place of entertainment and refreshment, a stage is fitted up, with all the usual adjuncts of a regular theatre, viz. places for receiving various charges for admission, a tableau curtain, footlights, and orchestra, set and side scenes, with drops and flies. There are also boxes, called balconies, for spectators, but what would be the pit in a theatre is here appropriated to tables for persons taking refreshments. The performance in question began with the descent of some forty to sixty women, draped in the theatrical costume of ballet dancers, from some high rocks built up at the back of the stage. They came down by a winding path, along what was said, and not denied, to be a real stream of water, to the stage. Some had wands, and others palm branches, and others daggers. Some remained grouped on the rocks, but the greater part danced on the stage to the music of a full orchestra, performing the evolutions of a ballet, stated to have been produced some time before in a pantomime at Drury-lane Theatre. But the serious business or incident represented by action seems to have been the attack of some imaginary enemy, who seemed to be put to death by some of the daggers on the floor. Mr. Donne, an experienced inspector of theatres, from the Lord Chamberlain's office, described the action as being pantomime accompanied by dancing, and thought that a story, though a vague one, was acted; that there was an engagement, and some resistance, then some expression of triumph, and in the end a reconciliation brought about by the chief dancer. The whole scene seems to have taken up from half to three-quarters of an hour. As it appeared only to comprise one act, the artistes who were examined styled it a ballet divertissement, agreeing, however, that this last could only be represented as such on a stage, with all theatrical accessories, and could in no case exist without pantomime—viz. pantomimic action. In this last tenet Mr. Donne agreed. The artists also said that ballets were composed, and that these compositions—viz. the directions for setting them on the stage, could be put in writing, so as to send a copy to the Lord Chamberlain, under sect. 12 of the Theatres Act, 6 Vict., as, I apprehend, the acknowledged pantomime is or may be sent. It seems to be agreed on all hands that pantomime is the expression of feeling or incident by gestures without words, and it is difficult to see how diversifying or mixing up pantomime with another sort of wordless action—dancing—makes incident expressed without words less pantomime than if exhibited without the dancing; and, after much consideration of this slippery subject, I think that on these facts pantomime was the core and gist of the performance, while the dancing was merely a graceful accessory or relief to it. Now, as to the law, I must take it that pantomime, as above described, existed in all time, or, at all events, in the 10 Geo. 2 and the 25 Geo. 2, the years 1737 and 1751, though not mentioned in either of the acts, 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, and 25 Geo. 2, c. 36. It is very possible that the only dancing contemplated by the Legislature in the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, was dancing by the visitors of the public places to which licenses for music and dancing were to be granted, and did not contemplate the exhibition of hired dancers there, much less that of pantomimic action by any one. However that may be, the Theatres Act, 6 Vict., on which the summons proceeds, does include "pantomime" in the catalogue of those stage-plays which in London and Westminster are illegal without the Lord Chamberlain's license; then this last enactment extends expressly the necessity for such license to a performance which might, perhaps, have been before untouched by the 10 Geo. 2 or the 25 Geo. 2, unless reached by the words "other entertainment of the stage," in the 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 2, or the words "other public entertainment of the like kind," in the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2—namely, those of a like kind with dancing and music only. This brings me to the remaining question, whether, supposing this public dancing by hired artists had not been accompanied by palpable pantomime, it was an "entertainment of the stage," for which, since the 6 Vict., if taking place in the metropolis, a Lord Chamberlain's license was required? And it seems to me, that dancing in this place of public resort by hired dancers in theatrical dresses, on a stage fitted up with the music, lights, and scenery used for performing ballets at a theatre, cannot be less "an entertainment of the stage," because such dancing in fancy dresses in a private house would not be such an entertainment. Let us observe the subjects comprised in the 10 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 2. They are "interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, play, farce, or other entertainment of the stage." Those in the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, are "public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind." Those in the 6 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, the Theatres Act, are "tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, burletta, interlude, melodrama, pantomime, and other entertainments of the stage" (the same words which occur in the 10 Geo. 2). Now, according to Rez v. Handy (6 T. R. 286), tumbling and fencing are not within these latter words in the 10 Geo. 2; and Lord Kenyon there reviewed his decision in Gallini v. Laborie (5 T. R. 242), in which he had, inter alia, declared public dancing to be an "entertainment of the stage," within the 10 Geo. 2. He said, that if he had stated in Gallini v. Laborie that these words extended to every species of stage entertainments—e. g. tumbling or fencing—he was mistaken. But in that close review of Gallini v. Laborie within so short a time after it occurred, he does not recall his opinion. Whether Lord Kenyon, in Gallini v. Laborie, was considering public dancing taken simpliciter, under the 25 Geo. 2, or public dancing on a stage at the Opera House in a ballet, accompanied by pantomime action, he was dealing with hired dancing accompanied by theatrical adjuncts, and in so dealing spoke of it as an "entertainment of the stage." Gallini v. Laborie was canvassed in De Bagnis v. Armistead (10 Bing. 107), without disapproval. I have minutely examined the above cases cited at the hearing, because the argument that the words "entertainment of the stage," as following tragedy, &c., in the 6 Vict., are said not to apply unless ejusdem generis with the preceding words, including pantomime, and the original case on the subject. The Archbishop of Canterbury's case (2 Rep. 46), with Sandiman v. Breach (7 B. & Cr. 96), and Es- parte Hill (3 Car. & P. 225), were cited. Lord Kenyon's dictum shews that the general words "entertainment of the stage," in the 10 Geo. 2, were, in his opinion, ejusdem generis with interlude, tragedy, &c., there preceding them, and which words reappear under similar collocation in the 6 Vict. Lawyers have always held his opinion in great respect, and I entirely concur with it. I also take it that the general purview of the Theatres Act (6 Vict.) was to impose stricter licensing requisites on dramatic exhibitions in places of public resort, and to confine public performances of a kind usually represented at theatres to theatres licensed as such in town and country. This view seems sanctioned, as to the rule of construction of ejusdem generis, by the late case of Doggett v. Catterm (2 Just. P. 818-824). The Court of Common Pleas then considered the Betting Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), and seem to have regarded the primary object of that act in construing and giving general effect to general words following particular words in a statute. On the whole, I hold the exhibition in question to have so far partaken of pantomime as to come within that word in the Theatres Act; and also, that if it had not so partaken, it was still, under all circumstances, an entertainment of the stage within that act. I convict the defendant in a mitigated penalty of 3*l.* 1*s.*, and with the less reluctance, as he has an opportunity of reversing my decision on appeal to the quarter sessions. I do not think it is a case for costs.

Sureties were tendered and taken for the purpose of the appeal.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE.—The fifth meeting of the Department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law will be held at 1, Adam-street, Adelphi, on Monday next, the 16th inst., when a report will be presented from the standing committee of the department, on Dr. Waddilove's paper, "On the Amendment of the Law of Evidence." A paper will also be read by the Rev. Nash Stevenson, M. A., "On the Probate and Succession Duty levied on Property left under General Power of Appointment." Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Q. C., M. P., will take the chair at eight o'clock.

MINUTES OF THE LAST MEETING.—Monday, Dec. 19, 1864.—The Hon. George Denman, Q. C., M. P., in the chair. The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed. Mr. Serjeant Pulling read a paper, intitled "A Proposal for amending the Laws affecting Jurymen." A discussion took place, in which Mr. Edgar, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Hall took part. It was moved by Mr. Daniel, Q. C., and seconded by Sir J. Eardley Wilmot, Bart., "that Mr. Serjeant Pulling's paper be received, and printed and circulated among the members." A further discussion followed, in which Mr. F. Hill, Mr. Teulon, Mr. Dunn, Mr. Rew, the Chairman, and Mr. Burch-Rosher took part; after which the motion was put and carried.

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.—There are 134 applications for admission during the present term, besides 70 renewed applications and for readmission. The number of attorneys on the roll is about 10,000.

LIABILITY OF BANK DIRECTORS.—A case of great interest to joint-stock banks in Scotland has occupied the attention of the Lord President of the Court of Session and a jury, at Edinburgh, for several days past. A Mr. Addie, who had taken shares in the now defunct "Great Western Bank" of Glasgow, and had paid up several calls, brought an action against the liquidators for recovery of all the moneys he had paid, on the ground that he had been induced to take the shares and pay the calls by the false and fraudulent reports as to the state of the bank put forth from time to time by the directors and their manager, which was resisted on the ground that he was not entitled in point of law to recover on such grounds; or that, if he were, he had barred his claim by his subsequent conduct. The Lord Advocate was engaged for the pursuer, and the Solicitor-General for Scotland for the liquidators. A great many witnesses were examined, and the inner history of the bank was traced out almost from its commencement to the hour of its stepping payment. On Tuesday the Lord President summed up, and his finding was objected to, of course, on opposite grounds, by both parties. The jury, after deliberating three quarters of an hour, returned a verdict for the pursuer, thus entitling him to recover, including interest, the sum of 35,561*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*

A SOLICITOR RECEIVING A STOLEN WATCH AS A FEE.—At the Liverpool Police Court on Tuesday, a man named Thomas James, was charged with being concerned, with his brother, in robbing a Mrs. Johnson, in December last, of a silver watch and several other articles. James's brother was apprehended and sent for trial to the sessions, but the present prisoner, desirous of having counsel for his brother, employed Mr. Brown, an attorney, to whom he gave a silver watch as a fee. This proved to be the watch stolen from Mrs. Johnson, who, on learning that Mr. Brown had the watch, applied to him for it. He refused unless paid his fee. These facts transpired during the hearing of the charge against James on Tuesday, but on an explanation from Mr. Brown, and on the payment of his fee, the watch was given up. James, however, was fined 5*l.*, or in default two months' imprisonment.

DEATH OF THE JUDGE OF THE BIRMINGHAM COUNTY COURT.—We regret to have to announce the death of Mr. William Nichols, the Judge of the Birmingham County Court. Mr. Nichols was appointed in October, 1862, to the judgeship, vacant by the death of Mr. Trafford, who had held the office for a considerable time. About the middle of last year he was ailing, and in September—at the end of the Long Vacation—he appointed Mr. Humphreys, of the Chancery bar, as his deputy, and went to Mentone, in Savoy, hoping that, by spending the winter in a warmer climate, he might come in the spring of the present year with renewed strength to his duties. He has written frequently to friends in Birmingham, and of late his letters have had a more hopeful tone. He suffered from dropsy, and no danger was apprehended until a few days before his death, when the disease assumed a more serious form, and he sank rapidly, and died on the 29th December.—Birmingham Post.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 21, 1865.

ALTHOUGH the number of the acts passed in the last session of Parliament is not very great, yet some of them are of sufficient importance to warrant us in briefly alluding to them, and pointing out their existence, for the benefit of such of our country readers as may have accidentally overlooked them.

The act which is of most general application, and therefore deserves the most prominent position, is cap. 112, which amends the law relating to future judgments, statutes, and recognisances. After reciting that it is desirable to assimilate the law affecting freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to that affecting purely personal estates in respect of future judgments, &c., this statute provides, that no judgment, statute, or recognisance to be entered up after the 29th July, 1864, shall affect any land, of whatever tenure, until such land shall have been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit, or other lawful authority, in pursuance of such judgment, &c. Definitions of "judgment," "land," and "debtor," are given; registration of the writ or process of execution is ordered, which registration is to be in the name of the debtor, and not of the creditor (as is ordered by the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), and need contain no reference to any prior registration of the judgment, &c.; power is given to the creditor to whom the land has been so actually delivered to petition the Court of Chancery for a sale, whereupon the Court is to make inquiries as to the debtor's interest and title, and follow, as far as possible, the practice with respect to sales of real estates of deceased persons for the payment of debts; and it is provided, that notice of the order of sale shall be given to all persons who appear to have charges on the land, and who may then attend the proceedings; and that all persons claiming any interest in the land through or under the debtor, by any means subsequent to the delivery of the land in execution, shall be bound by the order of sale and other proceedings.

The two acts which most deserve our attention are, perhaps, caps. 95 and 44—the one amending the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93 (as to the compensation of the families of persons killed by accident), by providing, that if there be no executor or administrator of the person deceased, or if there be no action brought within six months of the death by the executor or administrator, then the persons for whose benefit such action would have been brought may bring an action in the names or name of all or any of them; and by further providing, that in such action the defendant may pay into court a lump sum, as compensation to all persons, and be entitled to a verdict if it be sufficient: the other enacting, that when a wife has obtained an order protecting her earnings and property under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21, the husband, and any creditor or other persons claiming through him, may apply for its discharge; that such application may in all cases be to the Divorce Court, but that if a police magistrate granted the order, the application may be to him or his successor; if the justices in petty sessions did so, then the application may be to any subsequent petty sessions.

Parochial law has been considerably altered by a couple of statutes relating respectively to the assessment of poor rates, and the formation of districts for the repair of highways. Cap. 39, "The Union Assessment Committee Act, 1864," amends the analogous act of 1862, and enacts, that no person shall appeal to sessions against a poor rate, unless he gives to the assessment committee a specified notice of his objection to the valuation list, and fails to obtain relief from them; that the committee may appear in the appeal, and that their costs, if not recovered from the appellants, shall fall on the union fund, unless the Court orders them to be paid by the parish; and it also contains provisions as to the "valuation" notices to railways, &c. of the sums at which they are assessed, the non-disqualification of justices, certain expenses of the overseers, the borrowing of money, the duties of the clerk of the committee, the making of maps, and penalties on overseers. And cap. 101, "The Highway Act, 1864," most materially amends the act of 1862, as to the same subject-matter, but is of such length as to preclude any sketch within the space we can afford.

The administration of justice has been affected by three statutes. The first, viz. cap. 47, relates to the punishment of penal servitude, and makes five years the least term that can be awarded, except where there has been a previous conviction for felony, in which case seven years is to be the minimum; and it also gives power to certain justices to award corporeal punishment to convicts for offences during their confinement; contains provisions as to ticket-of-leave men reporting themselves to the police, and to the production and the forfeiture of their tickets; and the effects of such forfeiture, or committal of offences by convicts when out on such leave. The second, viz. cap. 110, prohibits justices from mitigating penalties contained in a public statute by virtue of any powers given by a local or private one. And the third, viz. cap. 115, extends the statute relating to poisoned grain, by making it penal to place poisoned flesh upon any land, except in the case of an occupier of a dwelling-house or other building, or owner of certain specified ricks, who may place poison for the destruction of vermin in such dwelling-house or building, or in any inclosed garden attached to such dwelling-house, or in the drains connected with such dwelling-house (protected so as to prevent dogs entering), or within such ricks.

The railway companies have been favoured with two statutes to enlarge their powers, without going again through the expense of a private bill; the one (cap. 120) intitled "The Railways Companies Powers Act, 1864;" the other (cap. 121) "The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864."

Cap. 114, "The Improvement of Land Act, 1864," now substituted for the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 100, is also of very great general importance, providing (as it does) a machinery by which landowners may borrow money for certain improvements, and make it a charge on the land, notwithstanding their estate be a limited one.

And, perhaps, cap. 19, which enables joint-stock companies, carrying on business in foreign countries, to have official seals to be used in such countries, may be considered of sufficient general interest to be mentioned especially.

Statutes have also been passed relating to certain banking copartnerships, the factory acts, the testing of chain cables, charity inrolments, chimney sweeps, corn accounts, customs, stamps, &c., government annuities, insane prisoners, malt for feeding purposes, metrical weights and measures, burials, the superannuation of poor-law officers, the warehousing of spirits, and military and naval affairs; besides many others to which, for general purposes, it is not necessary to allude.

It thus appears, that although Parliament has been accused of having failed to achieve anything during last session, it did not separate without passing several important statutes; that others of even more importance were not passed, was due to the extraordinary delay in bringing in the bills; but of these we shall, no doubt, hear more during the approaching session.

LAW REPORTING.

WE understand that the scheme of the Bar Committee has been under the consideration of the Benchers of Lincoln's-inn, and that they have passed a resolution expressive of their willingness to concur with the other Inns of Court in giving the guarantee mentioned in the fourth rule of the scheme recommended by the committee in their report, and in the event of the other Inns concurring, to appoint two members of the council proposed by the first rule of the scheme.

We believe that Lord St. Leonards and Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., approve of and support the scheme as a whole, and that the resolution we have mentioned was adopted almost unanimously.

The following letters to the Attorney-General from the President of the Incorporated Law Society, will shew that the scheme also has the approval of that influential body:—

“(No. 1).

“Incorporated Law Society,
Chancery-lane, Dec. 24, 1864.

“Sir,—I had the honour on the 17th instant to acknowledge the receipt of your letter expressing a hope that the Council of this Society would approve and further the objects of the scheme embodied in the report of the Bar Committee on the subject of Law Reporting, which has been adopted at a general meeting of the Bar held on the 28th ult.

“Your letter and the accompanying print of the report and scheme have been submitted to the Council, and I am requested by them to signify to you their approval of the objects and general principles of the scheme as embodied in the report, and their willingness to further them.

“The Council, however, direct me to state, that as they find the scheme comprises many matters of detail which appear to be important to its ultimate success, and as careful inquiry into the financial branch of the subject will better enable the Council to take effectual steps to promote the objects of the scheme on the part of solicitors generally, they are desirous of giving the matter further consideration.

“The Council hope very shortly to be able to communicate to you the course they determine to adopt.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your very obedient servant,

“E. S. BAILEY, President.

“To the Attorney-General, &c.”

“(No. 2).

“Incorporated Law Society,
Chancery-lane, Jan. 7, 1865.

“Sir,—On the 24th December last I had the honour to address a letter to you, signifying on the part of the Council of this Society, their approval of the objects and general principles of the scheme embodied in the report of the Bar Committee on the subject of Law Reporting. At the same time, I intimated that the Council were desirous of giving the financial branch of the scheme further consideration.

“I am now requested to inform you, that after discussing that subject very fully, the Council adhere to their approval of the scheme, as expressed in my former letter, and are prepared to nominate two members of their own body to act on the proposed council, under whose management and control it is suggested that the various Law Reports recommended by the Bar Committee shall be placed; and will make the nomination on being informed that the time has arrived for doing so.

“The Council do not, however, think it necessary or desirable to communicate in the meantime with the members of this society or solicitors generally on the subject. Such a communication appears to fall within the functions of the intended Council on Law Reporting, which will be able more effectually than the Council I have the honour to represent, to bring the proposed undertaking under the notice of the Profession, in the shape most likely to insure its ultimate success.

“I have the honour to be, Sir,

“Your very obedient servant,

“E. S. BAILEY, President.

“To the Attorney-General, &c.”

REPORT FROM THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON JUDGMENTS, &c. LAW AMENDMENT BILL, JUNE 17, 1864^a.

THE Select Committee to whom the Judgments, &c. Law Amendment Bill was referred, and who were empowered to report their observations to the House, have agreed to the following Report:—

In presenting their Report, the committee are desirous of stating shortly the nature of the materials from which they have been enabled to form their conclusions.

The committee have had the advantage of the attendance, for examination, of several of the most eminent solicitors in London and the provinces, including members of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, the President of the Law Society of Liverpool, the late President of the Law Society of Manchester, and other gentlemen of experience and reputation in both branches of the legal profession. The evidence is printed in extenso, and annexed to this Report.

The committee have also been favoured by the Incorporated Law Society with a valuable paper on the subject touched upon by the bill, in which the history and working of the existing system is stated in detail, the legal and practical anomalies pointed out, and suggestions made for its amendment. This paper will be found in the Appendix.

Returns have also been furnished from the Common Pleas Registry Office and the Registry Offices of the county of York, shewing the number of judgments that have been registered and re-registered therein from the 23rd July, 1860 (the date of the last act relating to judgments), down to the 31st March, 1864, together with the sums of money (within limits) thereby recovered or secured.

These returns will also be found in a tabular form in the Appendix.

The committee further report, that the bill which has been referred to them has been supported by petitions from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Society, the several Law Societies of Liverpool, Birmingham, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Manchester, as well as by a numerous body of solicitors of Chester. No petition or other memorial has been presented against the bill.

The modes in which a judgment, at the present day, operates upon the land of the judgment debtor, are three in number:—

1. If the debtor's interest be leasehold merely, the creditor may have the land sold by the sheriff, under the common-law writ of fieri facias, the writ by which goods and chattels are taken in execution. The operation of the fieri facias, however, does not in this country extend to estates for life, or any other freehold interest.

2. Whether the debtor's interest be freehold or leasehold, the creditor may avail himself of the statutory remedy by elegit, whereby he may now have the whole of the debtor's lands delivered to him, and hold them till he has satisfied his debt by receipt of the rents and profits.

3. A judgment duly registered and re-registered creates an equitable charge on the land, which, at the end of twelve months from the date of the entering up of the judgment, may be enforced by instituting a suit in Chancery, and obtaining a decree for a sale.

To the precautions of registration and re-registration, a third has been added by a recent act, and no judgment entered up after the 23rd July, 1860, affects any lands in the hands of purchasers or mortgagees, whether with or without notice of the judgment, unless a writ of execution has been issued and registered before the conveyance or mortgage was executed, and also execution put in force within three calendar months from the date of registration of such writ.

In estimating the merits of the present system, by which registered judgments now constitute a charge upon land, at least for the period of three months, the committee desire, first, to direct attention to the expense and inconvenience with which that system is attended. They then propose to consider how far the maintenance of the present system is advantageous to the various classes of persons affected by it; and, lastly, to shew the extent to which the evils now so widely felt will be remedied by the present bill, or any other more general measure.

The expense occasioned by the present system arises from a threefold source. First, there is the expense of registering the judgment, which falls, at all events in the first instance, on the creditor; secondly, there is the expense of getting rid of the judgment whenever a judgment debtor, having a large estate, wishes to sell any portion, however small; and, thirdly, there is the expense incurred by the purchaser or mortgagee in searching the register.

The first of these expenses, that of registering the judgment, is always of trifling amount; and if the creditor thereby betters his security, it is not one of which he has any right to complain. The same remark applies in part to the second expense, viz. that incurred by the judgment debtor in procuring a partial release of the judgment. But the peculiar operation of the judgment, in creating a lien on all the lands of the debtor, renders this release a very troublesome process. By the technical rule of law, a judgment cannot be released, even by deed, until after execution levied. The release may, perhaps, discharge the land from the equitable charge created by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13; but it cannot be relied on as preventing the land from being taken in execution under sect. 11.

It is doubtful whether the act of 1860 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 11), by which a partial release is restricted in its operation, has made any change in the law in this respect, and the result is, that the existence of the judgment is a great hindrance to the transfer of property, even where the judgment creditor is willing to waive his rights in favour of the transferee.

But the most serious expense and inconvenience is that which is incidental to the process of searching. In the Common Pleas Office, where all judgments are registered, only one fee is payable for a search against any number of names in one matter; but, of course, the solicitor's charges vary in each case with the numbers of such names and the changes of addresses of the parties. The ordinary expense of searching against a single name for judgments only, where there has been no change of residence on the part of the debtor, is between 30s. and 2*l.*; but it sometimes mounts up to a considerably larger sum, where the searches directed are numerous. If all the necessary searches are included, the average expense is not less than 5*l.* Taking the total number of conveyances in which searches are made, at a moderate computation, to be 16,000 a year, it follows that an annual cost is incurred of from 24,000*l.* to 32,000*l.* for mere searches for judgments, and of about 80,000*l.* for searches generally; and as a search is only requisite for discovering what is either concealed or unknown, this annual sum is spent merely for the purpose of ascertaining the existence of an incumbrance, of which the vendor has not given, or has not been able to give, notice to the purchaser. Even with all this expense, it does not follow that the search is effectual—and this for two reasons. It may be impossible to identify the debtor with the name upon the register. The judgment extends over a period of five years, and during that time the debtor may have frequently changed his abode. Where the name of the debtor is a common one, it is often impossible to distinguish the true object of the search, and the least doubt renders it necessary to extract all judgments against that name, which, of course, increases the trouble, if it does not increase the expense. The search may also be ineffectual, because it is not made at the last moment. A purchaser or mortgagee cannot safely complete, unless he searches up to the very hour when he advances his money. In London, this inconvenience is not so sensibly felt; but where the transaction takes place in the country, the proper course is to search up to four o'clock P.M., when the registry office closes, and then to telegraph the result, in order to complete before eleven o'clock A.M. next day, when the office opens again. In many cases even this would be impracticable, in consequence of defective means of communication.

It should be observed, that the act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 1, prescribes a new mode of registration, and establishes a new register, viz. one for writs of execution. The act requires the writ to be registered in the name of the execution creditor, and not in that of the debtor, as in other cases; and thus, not only is a double search now necessary where a single search sufficed before, but the inconveniences are considerably increased.

In view of the difficulty with which searching is attended, it is not surprising, that in small transactions it is omitted altogether. It is not possible to ascertain with accuracy the proportion which the number of searches made bears to the number of transactions of sales and mortgages. One witness states, that every person would make a search unless the property was small, and he knew something of the party with whom he was dealing. Another witness of large experience states the average to be not more than one in ten. All agree, that the number of judgments found is very small when compared with the number of searches made; one in eight, one in ten, one in fifty, according to the greater or less magnitude of the property dealt with. Yet it is certain, that notwithstanding the smallness of the proportion of judgments found to the total number of transactions of sale and mortgage, the purchaser or mortgagee incurs risk whenever he omits to search, and that if the omission is not sanctioned by his client, the solicitor would be responsible for any loss. As the country solicitors cannot conveniently make the search in person, they employ town agents to make it for them; and these latter, in order to limit their responsibility, usually have a common form of letter which they write to their country correspondents, intimating that though they make the search, they will not be responsible for the consequences that may ensue from any oversight or omission.

The practice of issuing such a disclaimer is strong evidence of the opinion entertained by the legal profession of the risk and uncertainty which are inseparable from any search, however carefully conducted.

Notwithstanding the risk, expense, and inconvenience which have been already adverted to, it might, no doubt, be contended that it would be undesirable to disturb the present operation of judgments if they formed part of the land credit system of the country. But the committee have arrived at the conclusion that judgments are seldom or never resorted to, in the first instance, as a mode of effecting a security upon land.

An examination of the returns printed in the Appendix will shew, that of the 5610 judgments registered between the 23rd July, 1860, and the 31st March, 1864, no less than 2549, or about one-half, were for sums under 100*l.* each, that 4008, or about five-sevenths, were for sums under 300*l.* each, and that the total number above 1000*l.* each in amount, was only 658, or at the rate of 180 per annum. The inference from these statistics is, that judgments are comparatively seldom resorted to as a security for large advances.

A judgment appears to be in general entered up, in the first instance, in order to give priority out of the personal estate, and to enable the creditor to seize the chattels of his debtor. Where the lender of money knows the borrower to be possessed of land, he resorts to the ordinary security of a regular mortgage, or obtains an equitable charge, in writing, on the particular land. The effect of a judgment in charging the land, is, in fact, only incidental, and many creditors, when they obtain judgments, are quite unaware that there is any land to be attached.

When a judgment is taken as a collateral security, it is generally resorted to on the chance of the judgment debtor becoming possessed of land hereafter, for the judgment binds after acquired property. A regular mortgage nearly always now contains a power of sale, and other facilities for realising having been afforded to the mortgagee by statute, judgments, as a collateral security, have fallen into almost complete disuse. In fact, it appears that the persons who are in the habit of lending money, and of taking judgments as security, are exactly those persons who ought to be least favoured by the law. It is stated to be not uncommon for money lenders to accept judgments in the hope of catching expectancies under family settlements or wills, and that the interest demanded on these occasions is often exorbitantly high; sometimes even reaching 50*l.* and 60*l.* per cent. per annum.

So far as landowners are concerned, the committee are of opinion that the abolition of judgments, as a means of borrowing money, would not be attended with any inconvenience whatever. A judgment, it is true, becomes a charge upon land without any previous investigation of title, and the same result may be accomplished by giving an equitable security, and that at a less expense. If a mortgage is made, the mortgagee can exercise his power of sale; but if a judgment is taken, the creditor must wait a year, and then file a bill in Chancery, and have a sale directed by the Court; and if he slumber upon his rights, he is exposed to the risk of having his lien defeated for want of re-registration of his judgment, or non-registration of his writ of execution.

For these reasons, the committee are of opinion with Mr. Christie, that landowners derive no advantage from the present system of judgments, and that they would be better without them.

But this is not a question which concerns landowners merely, or purchasers and mortgagees. It must also be regarded from the point of view of the creditor; and the committee, therefore, desire to state why they are also of opinion, that the judgment creditor has no claim to have the law maintained as it at present stands. It has been already intimated, that as between the creditor and the landowner, the equitable mortgage would serve all the purposes of a judgment, with the single exception of insuring publicity by registration. But this publicity, if an advantage to the creditor, is often attended with injury to the debtor. It is well known that there exists a society, formed for the purpose of searching and reporting all registered judgments in a table, which is called the "Commercial Compendium." The primary object of this society is, it may be imagined, the mutual protection of its members; but great and unnecessary depreciation of the credit of solvent tradesmen may be thereby occasioned; and a judgment registered for the purpose of charging the land is made a means of exposure of private affairs.

In order, however, to do justice to the creditor, his claims must also be compared with those of the purchaser or mortgagee. It must be remembered, that at present, in adjusting the relative rights of creditor and purchaser, the law makes a distinction between the effect of a judgment on personal and on real estate. It is provided by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 1), that "no writ of fieri facias, or other writ of execution, and no attachment against the goods of a debtor, shall prejudice the title to such goods acquired by any person bonâ fide, and for valuable consideration, before the actual judgment or attachment thereof, by virtue of such writ, provided such person had not at the time when he acquired such title, notice that such writ, or any other writ, by virtue of which the goods of such owner might be seized or attached, had been delivered to and remained unexecuted in the hands of the sheriff, under-sheriff, or coroner." That is to say, the law requires that, in order to entitle himself to the debtor's personal chattels, the creditor must actively assert his rights, and have them sold under a fiat facias. Is there any reason why real estate should not be put on the same footing as personal? Or if this be not practicable, from the difficulty on the score of title, which always besets the transfer of real estate, ought not the creditor, if he choose to grant time to the debtor, and to postpone suing out execution, to do so at his own risk?

Again: at present a creditor, in dealing with real estate, is in a better position than when dealing with stocks and shares. In the case of stocks or shares, a charging order must issue upon some specific interest of the debtor. The order does not extend to all a man's interest in the stocks, funds, and securities which he may possess, or in which he may have a dormant interest. So, again, a bill of sale is a bill of sale of the particular articles comprised in it. It is a lien upon specific goods and chattels. But a judgment creditor obtains a lien upon all lands, without distinction, both those already and those thereafter acquired, which is more than is obtained by an ordinary equitable mortgage. In Ireland, every judgment is required to be entered with an affidavit, stating what particular land it is to affect, and thus Irish judgments are assimilated to registered mortgages. But in England no such specification is necessary. The committee fail to see anything in the position of a judgment creditor which should entitle him to this peculiar benefit. They regard it as an abuse of the law that a man who lends money, knowing that he has got a judgment, should, by making an entry in a book kept in London, be able to force all purchasers of any of the debtor's lands, in all parts of the country, at their own peril to come and look after him, and to search to see that no incumbrance exists upon the lands bonâ fide contracted for. It is the duty of the vendor to disclose the judgment on the face of the abstract; and if he does not do so, he commits a fraud, for which he, and not the purchaser or mortgagee, ought to be answerable.

If the principles above stated are correct, they may be carried out, to a great extent, either by the present bill, or by extending the operation of the writ of fiat facias, so as to assimilate the modes of execution against real and personal estate. It has been much urged upon the committee that the latter is the more desirable alternative, as it would place the two kinds of property upon exactly the same footing. The inconvenience of putting the elegit in force is very considerable, and the equitable charge cannot, as already mentioned, be carried into effect till the expiration of a year. It has, accordingly, been proposed that the creditor should have power given him to force an immediate sale of his debtor's real estate. But there is some difficulty in determining how this is to be brought about. The courts of law have, at present, no adequate machinery for investigating titles like that which is possessed by the Chancery judges at chambers. If, therefore, an immediate sale took place, it would probably be better that it should be carried out under the direction of the Court of Chancery.

The other alternative by which the above principles may be enforced in practice is, by adopting the provisions of the present bill, so far as they tend in that direction.

The bill may be described as an extension of the act of 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), in so far as it does away with the interval of three months, which that act allows, to elapse between the execution and the registration of the writ. In order to bind a purchaser or mortgagee, the bill requires that the land shall have been actually taken in execution. The tendency of all recent enactments has been to bring about equal distribution between creditors, and to do away with the possibility of fraudulent preference. The committee are of opinion that, until the creditor has executed his judgment against the land, he ought to have lien or priority in respect of the land, just as he would have no prior claim against the debtor's personal effects till he had taken the proper steps for taking those effects in execution.

But the committee, while entirely approving of the bill as amended, feel that, if legislation were to stop here, many of the anomalies and inconveniences to be found in this department of the law would still remain untouched. Judgments are not the only means by which land is incidentally charged. The same result is also produced by Crown debts, and lites pendentes.

Many persons become sureties to the Crown without being aware that they thereby render their real estate liable; yet this liability is incurred by any obligation entered into under seal, whether ultimately matured into a judgment or not. Previously to the year 1839, the purchaser had no means of ascertaining whether such an obligation existed; but, by two enactments of the present reign, the bond must be registered and re-registered, in order that it may create a charge on the lands of the Crown debtor. The occasions which give rise to these so-called Crown debts are much more frequent than is commonly supposed, particularly in districts where excise operations are carried on. For example, wherever there is a large trade in malt, each maltster has to find two sureties to the Crown, and, the obligation being entered on the register, creates a charge on the maltster's land and the land of his sureties, which the purchaser generally requires to be removed. Though the suretyship is said to create a Crown debt, the liability under it is prospective merely, and, of course, in the majority of cases, never arises. Yet, the registered debt is not unfrequently found to be a serious hindrance to the transfer of land, and where its effect is properly understood, landowners are unwilling to become sureties, by reason of the inconvenience to which they are thereby subjected.

Even when the Crown debt has become satisfied, or the prospective liability discharged, frequently no quietus is entered up, and the debt consequently remains uncanceled in the register. This occurred in a case which has been brought under the notice of the committee, in which the Crown debtor was wholly unconscious of his liability, and the charge, not having been discovered till the last moment, might have entailed considerable difficulty and loss.

But the mischief is not confined to cases under the excise law. The Standing Orders of Parliament require that railway companies should give security for completion of intended lines of railway, so that the number of Crown debtors includes almost all railway directors. A case has been mentioned in the evidence, in which a railway director had become bound with the company, of which he was a director, for the completion of a short line, which was afterwards sold to one of the largest railway companies in the kingdom. Completion of the line having been delayed, owing to some alterations in the original scheme, the Crown debt operated as an incumbrance upon all the directors' lands for a period of several years. The debt was only discovered by the vigilance of a purchaser, who, however, consented to take the land subject to the debt, in reliance on the well-known wealth of the vendor.

The committee are of opinion that this state of things ought not to continue. They believe that a change in the law should be made, without prejudice to the rights of the Crown to priority in the recovery of debts and excise duties. The practice of registering, against solvent debtors, the bonds of themselves and their sureties for current accounts and liabilities, which may never in fact accrue, is, in their judgment, prejudicial to the public interest, by preventing landowners from giving security to the Crown, lest they should thereby be disabled from dealing with their property. It must not be forgotten that the present law of Crown debts dates from the 33 Hen. 8, when the amount of personal estate in the kingdom was much less considerable than at present, and that the protection then thought requisite may now be more easily dispensed with. At the same time, the committee are strongly impressed with the advisability of improving the writ of extent, so as to enable the Crown to take real estate in execution. If, as has been suggested with respect to ordinary creditors, greater facilities were afforded to the Crown to recover duties and debts by seizure and sale, they believe that both the public and the Crown would be the gainers. Vendors and purchasers would not be harassed by the discovery at the last moment of a concealed charge on the land, which the Crown has omitted to put in force for want of some speedy means of realising the sum due. The Crown might still retain its preference over all other creditors; but whilst the parties are solvent, and no intention to issue execution exists, principals and sureties should have free control over their property, and bona fide purchasers be able to enjoy the protection of the law.

The observations just made in reference to Crown debts apply with equal force to lites pendentes. A registered lis pendens charges an estate, though the claim made by the plaintiff is neither ascertained or acknowledged. The charge thus created continues to hold good till the suit or action is finally disposed of, and this, in the case of Chancery proceedings of an administrative character, may not take place for several years. In the meantime persons are debarred from purchasing, from a reluctance to involve themselves in litigation. In the proceedings for winding up joint-stock companies, the law of lis pendens is liable to be specially abused. It is not uncommon in such cases to register lis pendens against the parties alleged to be shareholders, with a view to prevent their transferring their land while the contest is going on. By this ingenious device the shareholders' land is rendered unmarketable, though it is not even incidentally the subject-matter of the litigation. The committee are, of course, aware that it is no argument for a change of a system, that the system is liable to be perverted; but the practicability of such a perversion serves to shew the largeness of the area which is covered by the registered lis. It seems to the committee that, in the event of a further measure being brought in, the case of lites pendentes ought to be particularly dealt with, and that no notice of a lis pendens should be binding unless the particular land affected by it be specified on the face of the register.

In conclusion, the committee suggest that an early opportunity should be taken of consolidating the existing law relating to judgments, and other incidental charges on land. The statutes now in force relating to these matters amount to at least twelve in number; and in order to arrive at the rights of a purchaser without notice, the law, as it stood before the year 1837, has on each occasion to be ascertained. This can only be done by laborious study, and is throughout surrounded with doubt and difficulty. With regard to future judgments, recognisances, Crown debts, lites pendentes, bankruptcies, and insolvencies, the committee are of opinion that they should no longer create a lien on the land till the land is actually taken in execution by the sheriff, coroner, or other legal authority, and that until this is done the land should be capable of sale and mortgage as effectually as purely personal estate.

The committee are also of opinion that it is deserving the consideration of Parliament, whether some more ready means cannot be devised for enabling land to be taken in execution than is at present afforded by the writs of extent or elegit, and that this should be done by enlarging or accelerating the legal or equitable remedies to which it is now competent to the judgment creditor to resort.

LAW AND LAWYERS IN IRELAND.

A VERY ridiculous application—principally remarkable for the illustration which it affords us of the manners and customs of attorneys in the south of Ireland—was made to the Court of Queen's Bench on Friday last. In the town of Youghal, be it known to all intending litigants, there are two attorneys called and described by the respective names of Kildahl and Walshe. Mr. Kildahl is a young man, and Mr. Walshe middle-aged; but, notwithstanding the disparity of age, they have this in common, that both are attorneys, and both play billiards. The two were in the billiard-room on the 16th of last November. These gentlemen not only play, but bet in a free and off-hand manner, yet not without a prudent resolution to limit their wagers to sums within their means. On the evening in question, as the lawyers say, this brace of legal billiard players were betting as usual. They betted half-a-crown. With regard to the final destination of the stakes a difference of opinion arose, and it seems that, conscious of the important interests involved, there was some talk respecting "a reference to Bell's Life on the matter." The fate of the half-crown, it would appear, was ultimately settled without the intervention of the London sporting journal, and, as happened in the case of the incipient duel between Mr. Richard Swiveller and the infuriated market gardener, the affair ended, one may suppose, in Mr. Walshe looking at Mr. Kildahl, and in Mr. Kildahl looking at Mr. Walshe. "The affair," one is glad to find it recorded, "passed over without anything disagreeable having taken place between the parties." Subsequently, however, things took a turn for the worse. The two gentlemen named, as well as some others, were in the billiard-room, when somebody "proposed to bet one shilling on the game." The immediate result of this startling proposition is told in the report of the consequent application to the Court of Queen's Bench. Here is what followed:—"Mr. Kildahl said to Mr. Walshe, 'I will bet one shilling to stop your mouth.' Mr. Walshe, who was engaged in the play, turned round, and inquired, 'Who said that?' Mr. Kildahl said, 'I did.' Mr. Walshe remarked to him, 'I will not bet with you, or with any one that will not pay a bet.' He was about to resume the play when Mr. Kildahl gave him a kick behind, in the presence of ten or twelve gentlemen." The blue blood of the Kildahl's was on fire at once. The equally blue blood of the Walshe's ignited simultaneously. Of course, friends interfered, with earnest entreaties, beginning, "For God's sake, gentlemen," &c.; but it was of no use whatever. Mr. Walshe, as we read in the abstract of his affidavit, felt that "the remarks of Mr. Kildahl were addressed to him in a very rude and offensive manner, and that the blow, though not violent, was inflicted on him in a public room, with the view, as he believed, of inducing him there to engage in a physical encounter, to cause him to commit a breach of the peace, or induce him to send a hostile message;" but, to Mr. Walshe's credit be it said, he nobly resisted the pugnacious suggestions of the inner man, and "soon after the occurrence" became "desirous of putting the matter into the hands of his solicitor." Friends, however, interposed. They spoke of an apology. Mr. Walshe was agreeable. They spoke of 5*l.* to be paid by Mr. Kildahl to a charitable institution. Both parties approved the suggestion; but, melancholy to relate, the amicable settlement fell through. The apology was not what it ought to be. The 5*l.* was sent in company with offensive language; and Mr. Walshe, with the feelings of a man, a solicitor, and a billiard-player, at fever heat within him, rushed into the Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information. In the result he did not get it. Instead of this, he was courteously informed that the case was one of assault, determinable at petty sessions, and that he might thank his own tongue for what happened to him in connexion with Mr. Kildahl's foot. The Court had something else to do, it was intimated, than deal with petty affairs of the kind; so that, for the present, Mr. Walshe has appealed in vain to the outraged laws of his country.

COMMISSIONER APPOINTED TO ADMINISTER OATHS AT COMMON LAW.—Nov. 23, 1864.—The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer have appointed George Corpe, of No. 3, Lincoln's-inn-fields, Gentleman, to be a London Commissioner for administering Oaths at Common Law in the said courts.

THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—Their Lordships will sit on Monday, and on the following Monday the Committee will resume the customary sittings. No day has been appointed for judgment in the Colenso case.

SITTINGS OF THE ARCHES COURT.—At the Arches Court, on Monday, an application was made to appoint a day for the hearing of a case which had been some time pending. The Court sits very seldom (about once during term), and it was stated that it was desirable that the matter should be disposed of. The Dean of Arches (Dr. Lushington) expressed his readiness to sit at any time required when he could do so, in reference to the Admiralty Court business. All that was required was, to arrange matters with the registrar of the Admiralty Court. At the same court two cases of disputes respecting church rates, which had also been pending some time, were advanced a stage.

THE ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES OF BANKRUPTCY OFFICIALS.—At the Nottingham Bankruptcy Court, Mr. Commissioner Sanders delivered judgment in the case of Mr. Harris, official assignee of the Birmingham District Court of Bankruptcy, at Nottingham, who was charged by Mr. Chief Registrar Miller with having kept in hand more than 100*l.* in one bankrupt's estate, or above 1000*l.* in the aggregate of estates, as the case might be, for more than one week, whereby he had become chargeable, under the 159th section of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, and rendered liable to a penalty of 20*l.* per cent. on the sums so detained. Mr. Harris was also charged with using the money for his own private purposes. The learned commissioner gave a detailed account of Mr. Harris's quarterly returns from 1861 (when the new act came into operation) down to 1864. He said he had closely examined the accounts, and found that there were only two instances in which the official assignee had had in hand more than 1000*l.* on the aggregate of estates for above a week—one was on the 16th August, 1863, when there was an excess of only 1*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.*; and the other was on the 16th September, 1863, when he had in hand 27*l.* 14*s.* above the sum mentioned in the act. The first-mentioned sum was too small to be taken into consideration, and the retention of the latter sum was accounted for by the absence of Mr. Harris from home during the long vacation, for during his absence no payments could be made; but after his return the sum was reduced to its proper amount. He complained, that the conduct of Mr. Commissioner Ayrton and Mr. Commissioner Harding was too precipitate, inasmuch as they jumped at conclusions, and made statements in their report, for which they had no legal ground. Their report dealt in generalities; it stated that sums had been retained for more than seven days, contrary to the act; but it did not say when the offence was committed, nor upon what amount the 20*l.* per cent. was to be charged. By the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, the manner of remunerating the official assignee was entirely changed. Before that time, he received fees out of which he had to defray all office expenses; but by the new act he ceased to receive fees, and was limited to a salary, free of all such expenses. No rules or orders were made under the new act, as to how the office expenses were to be paid, and Mr. Harris accordingly paid these, together with other expenses, out of money in hand received from bankrupts' estates. These payments would reduce the balance to the amounts mentioned in his cash-book. With reference to 1863*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, which Mr. Harding and Mr. Ayrton said the official assignee ought to return, he having received it in fees, and not entered in his accounts, the commissioner said that they had not sufficient grounds for calling upon Mr. Harris to refund it. Mr. Harris might not unreasonably suppose that he was entitled to those fees as they were from estates under the old act. The practice in the London courts under the old act was for the official assignee to receive four-fifths of the fees, and the other fifth was paid into court. This sum of 1863*l.* was made up of fees so obtained. The conduct of Mr. Chief Registrar Miller was indefensible. He had instituted a prosecution, and then withdrawn from it, in a manner by no means creditable. Having gone through all the matters connected with the charge in open court against Mr. Harris, the commissioner was of opinion that Mr. Harris must be acquitted of fraud, or any attempt to convert the public money to his private purposes. That his books were not methodically and accurately kept must be admitted, and was a subject of great regret; but it had brought its punishment with it, and the anxiety it must have occasioned throughout so lengthened an investigation would be a safe guarantee in preventing any such irregularity for the future. No order could, therefore, be made to charge him with 20*l.* per cent. upon any sum.

SURVIVORSHIP.—In 1806 Mr. Mason and one son were drowned at sea; his remaining eight children went to law, some of them against the others; because if the father died before the son, 5000*l.* would be divided equally among the other eight children, whereas if the son died before the father the brothers only would get it, the sisters being shut out.—A few years afterwards Job Taylor and his wife were lost in a ship wrecked at sea; they had not much to leave behind them, but what little there was was made less by the struggles of two sets of relatives, each striving to shew that one or other of the two hapless persons might possibly have survived the other by a few minutes.—In 1819 Major Colclough, his wife, and four children were drowned during a voyage from Bristol to Cork; the husband and wife had both made wills, and there arose a pretty picking for the lawyers in relation to the survivorships and next of kin, and trying to prove whether the husband died first, the wife first, or both together.—Two brothers, James and Charles Corbet, left Demerara on a certain day in 1828, in a vessel of which one was master and the other mate; the vessel was seen five days afterwards, but from that time no news of her fate was ever received. Their father died about a month after the vessel was last seen. The ultimate disposal of his property depended very much on the question whether he survived his two sons, or they survived him. Many curious arguments were used in court. Two or three captains stated that from August to January are hurricane months in the West Indian seas, and that the ship was very likely to have been wrecked quite early in her voyage. There were, in addition, certain relations interested in James's dying before Charles, and they urged that, if the ship was wrecked, Charles was likely to have out-lived by a little space his brother James, because he was a stronger and more experienced man. Alas for the "glorious uncertainty!" One bigwig decided that the sons survived the father, and another that the father survived the sons.—About the beginning of the present reign three persons—father, mother, and child—were drowned on a voyage from Dublin to Quebec; the husband had made a will, leaving all his property to his wife; hence arose a contest between the next of kin and the wife's relations, each catching at any small fact that would (theoretically) keep one poor soul alive a few minutes longer than the other.—About ten years ago a gentleman embarked with his wife and three children for Australia; the ship was lost soon after leaving England; the mate, the only person who was saved among the whole of the crew and passengers, deposed that he saw the hapless husband and wife locked in each other's arms at the moment when the waves closed over them. There would seem to be no question of survivorship here; yet a question really arose, for there were two wills to be proved, the terms of which would render the relatives much interested in knowing whether husband or wife did really survive the other by ever so small a portion of time.—Dickens's All the Year Round.

PRIVATE BILLS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—On Wednesday Mr. Smith and Mr. Frere, the Examiners, held their respective courts in the committee-rooms, to ascertain whether the promoters had complied with the Standing Orders of the House in respect to private bills. Mr. Smith took twelve railway bills (nine unopposed and three opposed), and Mr. Frere proceeded in the same manner with a similar number. As there are 596 private bills, the Examiners will be some time engaged in the investigation. There are 245 railway bills for England; 66 for Wales; 54 for Scotland; and 37 for Ireland. Of other private bills, on which the deposit is four per cent., there are, 37 waterworks and gas; 37 gas; 4 harbour and dock; 4 market; and 23 town improvement bills; road bills and miscellaneous make up the number. Among the bills are that of the Midland for additional powers, and the North London, Highgate, and Alexandra Park Bill.

THE WIMBLEDON-COMMON BILL.—We are informed that the committee who, at Earl Spencer's instance, were appointed to consider the provisions of this bill, have presented their report to his Lordship. The report contains recommendations intended to remove objections suggested by certain of the clauses in the bill, and it is now under the consideration of his Lordship and his advisers.

ACTION AGAINST A RAILWAY COMPANY FOR DELAY.—In the Manchester County Court, before Mr. E. Ovens, as judge, an action was brought by Mr. J. Heywood, publisher and newsagent, Deansgate, Manchester, against the London and North-western Railway Company, to recover 4*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* damages for delay in the delivery of a quantity of periodicals consigned to the plaintiff from publishing houses in London. Mr. Cobbett was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Woolley (Brett & Woolley) for the company. The plaintiff was in the habit of receiving parcels from London by a goods train due in Manchester at half-past three on Thursday mornings. On the 8th December his man went to the station as usual between half-past three and four o'clock, but the train had not arrived, and, in fact, did not reach Manchester until seven o'clock, and the parcels were not delivered to the plaintiff's man until half-past seven. The periodicals comprised Cassell's Paper, the Navgate Calendar, and other serial publications issued weekly. The result of the non-arrival of the parcels was, that the plaintiff was unable to send off several small orders to country agents with the newspapers, and they were consequently left upon his hands. In addition to these, a quantity ordered for his own retail department had remained unsold, and the total value of periodicals thus left on hand amounted to 4*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* It appeared that the delay was occasioned by the breaking of an axle; and the judge held, that, prima facie, this was negligence for which the defendants were liable. They had contracted with the plaintiff and other publishers to carry parcels, which should arrive in ordinary course at half-past three. It was true that the defendants sent their men there at that early hour to deliver the parcels, but this was in consequence of a mutual arrangement, whereby the defendants were to secure this traffic on their own line. It could not be said that a delay of four hours beyond the customary time was a reasonable delay; and the judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff. Then, as to the damages, his Honor thought that the plaintiff had no right to recover with respect to the moiety of the unsold papers which he would have sold himself; for it was not likely that, having arrived in Manchester at half-past seven, the delay could have prevented their sale. But the case was different with respect to the periodicals that were to have been sent off with the newspapers by early trains, and which were not sent afterwards, because the quantities were so small. For these the plaintiff was entitled to recover half the amount claimed; but the value of the serials as waste paper, estimating it at 8*s.* 4*d.*, must be deducted; and he should, therefore, give judgment for 2*l.*

RAILWAY CARRIERS IN FRANCE.—A curious trial has taken place this week, which has settled a vexed horticultural question. It is now decided that cauliflowers are not simple cabbages. This point was determined in a case of A Railway Company v. Importers of Salad. The plaintiffs pleaded, that by reason of its head, a cauliflower required especial care in transit. The defendants set it up as mere cabbage, treating the head as an accident requiring no special service. If the head was broken, a capias ad satisfaciendum, as it might be called, would enable them to pick up the pieces, and render them serviceable. The Court, however, held, that a cauliflower was a delicate plant, ruled that it was entitled to be placed with peas, and therefore a verdict was given in favour of the careful carriers.

DEATH OF LADY BROUGHAM.—Lady Brougham died at Brighton on Thursday the 12th, shortly after two o'clock. Her ladyship had been staying at that watering-place since August, and up to the Monday preceding her death was in her usual health, so much so, that she intended to leave Brighton on Monday next for Grafton-street. However, her ladyship was attacked with bronchitis, and died at the hour above named. Lady Brougham was the eldest daughter of Mr. Thomas Eden (uncle of the late Earl of Auckland and Lord Henley). The lamented lady was twice married, first to Mr. John Spalding, of Holme, N.B.; and secondly, on the 1st April, 1819, to Lord Brougham, then Mr. Henry Brougham. Her ladyship, who was in her 77th year, had issue by Lord Brougham two daughters, one born in 1820, and who died in 1821; and the Hon. Eleanor Louisa Brougham, who died in the bloom of youth in 1839. The intelligence of her ladyship's death was immediately transmitted to the noble and learned lord, who was staying at his residence at Cannes.

OBTAINING LAW BOOKS BY FALSE PRETENCES.—At Bow-street, on the 17th instant, Joseph Warren, a young man whose apparel, originally stylish, was becoming sadly worn and shabby, was charged with obtaining a copy of Broome's Legal Maxims, and attempting to obtain a second, from Messrs. Stevens, of 26, Bell-yard, law booksellers, by false pretences. Mr. Stevens stated, that on the 12th instant the prisoner called at his shop, and asked for a copy of Broome's Legal Maxims, for Messrs. Carington & Sons, solicitors, of Throgmorton-street. It was delivered to him, and he signed an acknowledgment in the name of Williamson. He called again last night, and asked for another copy. Suspecting that all was not right, witness desired his assistant to go with the prisoner to Throgmorton-street. John Reeves, the assistant, said he accompanied the prisoner to Throgmorton-street. He appeared very unwilling to go there, and made one or two attempts to get away, but witness would not let him. On arriving at Throgmorton-street, witness ascertained that the prisoner had formerly been in the service of Messrs. Carington & Sons, but was not now, and had no authority to obtain the books. Witness gave him into custody. He was remanded for further examination.

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

THE EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

THE PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

The Policies of this Society, in the hands of third parties, are not vitiated by SURVIVOR, or by the Life assured proceeding beyond the limits allowed.

NOTICES of ASSIGNMENT of Policies registered and acknowledged free of charge. Printed Forms for such Notices furnished when required.

The usual Commission allowed to Solicitors introducing Insurances, the Commission being continued to the person originally entitled to it as long as the Policy remains in force, through whatever channel the Premium may be paid.

LOANS granted on the Society's Policies, on Reversions, Life Interests, and other approved Security.

The Annual Reports and full Statements of Account are regularly printed, and may be obtained on application.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JANUARY 28, 1866.

ONE of the main evils of profuse reporting is the encouragement it affords to the arguing and deciding of cases by reference to authorities supposed to be in point, rather than by the light of established general principles. For illustration, we may refer to the case of Heelis, App., Blain, Resp., decided by the Court of Common Pleas (Erle, C. J., and Keating, J.) in November, 1864 (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 18; 13 Weekly Rep. 262). The question arose upon a case stated by a revising barrister, by which it appeared that the appellant claimed to vote under the Reform Act, 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 26, as having been in "the actual possession" of a share of a certain rent-charge of 50% for six calendar months previous to the 31st July, 1864. The rent-charge was originally created by a deed of the 10th June, 1839, and made payable at Midsummer and Christmas, and had been paid half-yearly since that time. By indenture, dated the 29th January, 1864, Stephen Heelis, in whom the rent-charge was vested, granted it to John Heelis and his heirs, to the use of the five sons of the said Stephen Heelis, their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common. The first half-yearly payment which fell due after the transfer, was paid in July, 1864. It was objected, that the appellant, who was one of the five cestuis que use, did not obtain actual possession of his share until the payment in July; and the case of Murray and Another, Apprs., Thorniley, Resp. (2 Q. B. 217; 10 Jur. 270) was relied on. In that case, a claim to be registered in respect of the possession of a rent-charge for six months previous to the last day of July, 1845, was rested on a deed dated the 25th January, 1845, whereby a rent-charge of 6*l.* 3*s.* (not previously existing) was granted to the appellants and their heirs, to be paid on the 1st January in every year, the first payment to be made on the 1st January then next ensuing. The argument against the qualification proceeded on the well-known rule, that there is no actual seisin of a rent-charge at the common law until the owner has received some payment on account of the rent; and this, whether he claims under a grant or devise of a rent newly created, or a grant or devise of a rent previously existing. The Court held, that the words "actual possession," in the Reform Act, meant "a possession in fact, as contradistinguished from a possession in law; and that, as the possession in fact of a rent-charge must be the actual manual receipt of the rent itself, or some part of it, or of something in lieu of it, so there could be no such possession in fact in that case, where the first payment of the rent did not become due until after the expiration of the month of July, and where nothing whatever took place but the mere execution of the deed;" and they referred to the authorities collected in Com. Dig., tit. "Seisin," (C.) and (D.), establishing the distinction between a seisin in law and a seisin in fact of a rent-charge. In Haydon, App., Overseers of Twerton, Resp. (4 C. B. 1), the Court of Common Pleas held, that an assignee of an existing rent-charge did not acquire actual possession of it before he received payment. In Heelis's case, Mr. Joshua Williams, for the appellant, contended, that as the rent-charge was limited to his use, the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8, c. 10, s. 1, gave him "the lawful seisin, estate, and possession of and in the same" rent; and he cited many authorities to shew that the statute passes the actual possession; among them, an anonymous case in Cro. Eliz. 46, or rather a note of the reporter, "that cestui que use at this day is immediately and actually seised and in possession of the land, so that he may have an assize or trespass before entry against any stranger who enters without title, and this by the words of the statute; and this was the opinion of divers justices." On the strength of these authorities, the Court decided in favour of the claim. "At common law," said Erle, C. J., "there would have been no actual possession till July; and there are two authorities for this. But this was not a conveyance at common law, but under the Statute of Uses. The stat. 27 Hen. 8, c. 10, s. 1, gives the cestui que use possession immediately on the execution of the deed creating the use. Now, the stat. 2 Will. 4, c. 45, by sect. 26, requires the claimant to be in actual possession. I think, however, that the Legislature intended the same meaning to the word 'possession' in the stat. Hen. 8, as it did to the words 'actual possession' in the 26th section of the Reform Act. Of course, any illusory act would have no operation, such as the payment of a penny for rent." [Why not? Such a payment would give the actual seisin of the rent at common law, and could not be more illusory than the merely technical juggle of limiting a use.] "The word 'possession' has always had a technical and perfectly well understood meaning among conveyancers; and we have the highest authority for giving great weight to the practice of conveyancers." According to the report in the Weekly Reporter, the Chief Justice remarked, that the mantle of some of the old conveyancers had descended on Mr. Williams, and the Court had had the benefit of it in the argument—a well-merited compliment—which, however, would have been more valuable if the Court had shewn a better appreciation of the learned conveyancer's argument, by exposing the fallacy that lurked in it. Mr. Williams made the best of a bad case, and obtained a judgment in his favour, but the decision was plainly erroneous. The conveyance in question was not a conveyance operating under the Statute of Uses, but a grant at common law, passing a legal seisin or title, but insufficient to pass the actual seisin or possession of the rent, which could only be obtained by the receipt of the rent, or of something in lieu of it. The words of the 1st section of the Statute of Uses are, that the person who has the "use, shall from thenceforth stand and be seised, deemed, and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate, and possession of and in the same honours, castles, manors, lands, rents, service, remainders, and hereditaments, with their appointments, to all intents, constructions, and purposes in the law, of and in such like estates as they had or shall have in use, trust, or confidence of or in the same, and that the estate, till, right, and possession that was in such person or persons that were or hereafter shall be seized of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to the use, confidence, or trust of any such person or persons, or of any body politic, be from thenceforth clearly deemed and adjudged to be in him or them that have, or hereafter shall have, such use, confidence, or trust after such quality, manner, form, and condition as they had before in or to the use, confidence, or trust that was in them." Nothing can be plainer from these words, than that the estate and possession which are transferred to the cestui que use are the estate and possession, or part of the estate and possession, which are in the grantee to use, and cannot exceed or be more absolute or consummate than such estate and possession. "The matter and substance of the estate of cestui que use is the estate of the feoffee, and more he cannot have." (Bac. Uses, 47). "If the conusee of a fine, before any attornment, by deed indented and inrolled, bargaineth and selleth the signiorie to another, the bargainee shall not distrain, because the bargainor could not distrain, et sic de similibus, for nemo potest plus juris ad alium transferre quam ipsi habet." (Co. Litt. 309. b.) Sir Moyle Finch's case (6 Rep. 68 a.) was not cited by Mr. Williams, although, as far as it goes, it is an authority in his favour. There it was held, that a fine levied by a reversioner to the use of another than the conusee, passed the estate so completely that cestui que use might avow for the rent, or have an action for waste, without any attornment, because the Statute of Uses passed the seisin immediately, and made it impossible that the conusee should have a quid juris clamat, &c. But the reasons, such as they were, on which that conclusion was founded, were held to be inapplicable to a conveyance by deed; so that a grant of a reversion to uses was imperfect without attornment, and was capable of being perfected by attornment to cestui que use. (Harvell v. Lucas, Moore, 99 a.). See Dixon v. Harrison, Vaugh. 51; and the conclusion of the judgment in Long v. Buckeridge (1 Str. 112). However it might have been in the case of a fine or a recovery, it is clear, equally on principle and on authority, that in that of a mere grant to uses the actual seisin or possession does not pass under the Statute of Uses, unless it is first in the grantee to uses. In the principal case John Heelis took by grant at common law a legal seisin of the rent, and he took nothing more than that seisin, and nothing more passed to the cestuis que use. The Court committed the mistake of confounding a conveyance to uses, transferring the title by a common law assurance, with a bargain and sale or covenant to stand seised of an existing rent by one already in the actual seisin and possession of the rent. Finding decisions to the effect, that the Statute of Uses transfers the actual possession, they looked no further, but jumped to the conclusion, that wherever the statute operates, the actual seisin passes. This would not have happened fifty years ago, when cases were the servants, not the masters, of principles.

A further moral to be deduced from the case is, that the old learning as to seisin and possession and uses, having done its work, is now obsolete, and should be abolished, as fines and recoveries have been abolished; provided that the task be undertaken by some one fully enveloped in the mantle of the late Mr. Brodie. It is the fashion to abuse the practice of conveyancing as being founded on the abstruse learning of uses. Theoretically, that is so, although the practice at the present day is simple enough, and none of the evils that the laity are taught to charge on the Statute of Uses are fairly attributable to it. But still the old learning crops up occasionally, and never to any good purpose.

Reviews.

The Notanda Digest, with Synoptical Index of the Decisions in Law, Equity, Bankruptcy, Admiralty, Divorce, and Probate Cases. By TENISON EDWARDS, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. From December, 1862, to December, 1864. 8vo., pp. 151. [Day.]

It is now nearly two years since Mr. Edwards commenced the publication of his very useful Notanda. Great praise is due to him for his enterprise in the commencement of an undertaking which, we believe, for a long time attracted little notice from the Profession, and for the perseverance and industry with which he has carried it on, until (as we must infer from its continuance to the present time) it has become a successful speculation. For the sake of those who are still unacquainted with the work, we may reprint the author's explanation of his original plan:—

"The question is: How can the practitioner with the greatest facility make himself acquainted with the latest decisions upon any given subject? And my reply is: By looking, not through a dozen annual digests, but by looking to the standard text-books, such as Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, Williams on Executors, Jarman on Wills, &c.; and there, in juxtaposition with the topics treated of, and on the very page where the author in his next edition would introduce the modern decisions, to find clear and intelligible notes of such decisions as have been come to upon the particular topic since the edition of the work. Or, if the question turn upon the construction of a statute, to turn to the section of that statute, and there to find like clear and intelligible notes of the decisions upon that particular section. I have explained my plan in answering the above question, and I have no fear of a contradiction from any practical man."

The work consists of short notes of cases reported in the authorised and unauthorised reports, and of the statutes as they are passed, with references to the text books, leading cases, or statutes, in which they may be noted up, either by copying or by actually cutting out each note and gumming it to the place referred to, or by entering merely the number of the note, for which purpose the notes are numbered consecutively. The number affixed to the last entry in Notanda for December, 1864, is 3214.

Not content with the use of the work as an aid to noting up, Mr. Edwards now publishes with each number an index to that number, and to all those which have preceded it, so that there is never any more than one index for reference. This, he suggests, may serve as a partial index to all the text books referred to in the Notanda, and also be a digest, revised and renewed at frequent intervals, to all the cases from the time of the commencement of the work; thus differing from the yearly and half-yearly digests hitherto published. The Digest, therefore, consists of the several numbers of Notanda collected together, with a brief index of titles, renewed from time to time, and referring to the several notes by their numbers. The convenience of the plan is, that it renders the accumulation of several years accessible by means of a brief and inexpensive index; the necessary inconvenience is, that every reference directed in the index must be made before it can be ascertained whether it is material or not. And we think that the index has been made a little too meagre. We must now let the author be heard in its favour:—

"The advantages of such a Digest are numerous. First, it will only be necessary to look to the one index for many years to come, instead of having to hunt through a number of annual digests; and in the interval between the last index and its successor (a period of about six months), the new cases will be found in the fresh numbers of Notanda, under the text books and statutes, instead of having to hunt through the reports of the current year. Secondly, by means of the Synoptical Index, the reference to the reversal, affirmance, overruling, or questioning of any case, will be found in juxtaposition with the reference to the original case, so that all trouble is removed in discovering whether a case is still law. Thirdly, by reason of the notes in Notanda being headed with a reference to the text book treating upon the subject of the note, the practitioner not only finds the new point for which he was in search, but without any trouble he also finds the reference to the text book where the subject is treated of at large. Thus, for instance, the practitioner desires to ascertain whether there has been any late authority upon the subject of an implied reservation of an easement. He looks to the Synoptical Index, and he finds two references—1070 and 1871. He turns to the first, where he finds the case of Suffield v. Brown, in which the reservation was implied, and he also finds the reference to Gale on Easements, where the general subject is discussed. He then looks to the second reference, 1871, and he finds that that decision has been reversed on appeal."

"In conclusion, purchasers are requested to remember, that for the purposes of the Digest they need not purchase over again that which they already have, and that their Digest will always be kept up complete by becoming subscribers to the Notanda and the Synoptical Index, or by purchasing the numbers subsequent to their Digest and the last Synoptical Index.

"The Notanda is now printed on both sides for the purpose of the Digest, as well as on one side for posting up in the text books and statutes."

LAW REPORTING.

We understand that on Friday, the 20th January, the Bench of the Middle Temple unanimously passed resolutions in favour of the scheme recommended by the Bar Committee, to the same effect as the resolutions previously adopted by the Council of the Bench of Lincoln's Inn.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—THE DIGESTION AND CODIFICATION OF THE LAW.

A MEETING of this society was held on Monday night at St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, Mr. Macqueen, Q. C., presiding.

The Chairman stated, that the Lord Chancellor had intimated his intention to be present, but that an important engagement, which had been subsequently made for the noble lord, prevented him from attending.

Mr. Hawkins read a paper on "Digests and Codes, with reference to Law Reform." He began by noticing the difference between a digest and a code—a digest being merely a collection and statement of existing statutes and common law, while a code was a re-arrangement and re-expression of law in a systematic form. A code of law sought to embody the following elements:—First, a collection of rules, including explanations, definitions, descriptions, and qualifications of rules; secondly, examples and illustrations of rules; and, thirdly, passages from judgments, and other authoritative matter, containing the grounds and reasons of rules. A code did not necessarily involve any alteration in the existing law. Where a conflict of opinion existed, the code would merely state the difference, and leave the question where it stood; and when the point was settled, the passage would be replaced by the rule. The subsequent accretions of law would be from time to time reduced to systematic form, and incorporated with the code. It seemed to be clear that the law of a civilised country ought to exist in systematic form. Referring to the objections entertained to codification, he said that too much weight ought not to be attached to the supposed unfavourable experience of other countries. In most of these cases the codification had been an attempt to express, by legislative authority, abstract rules of law; but what he proposed was the re-arrangement and re-expression of the existing law. He denied that uncoded law possessed greater plasticity and flexibility, and would not admit that there was greater certainty of induction from precedent as opposed to the study of rules in express terms. On the contrary, he maintained that the master vice of case law was, the impossibility of fixing beyond subsequent dispute what were the exact limits of the question decided. He advocated the codification of the law, not only on the grounds that it was impossible for a lawyer to acquire a complete knowledge of any but his own branch of law—that the difficulties attending the study of the existing law was so great, and that it required so many years to acquire what was called a legal mind; but on the ground of the enormous rate at which case law and statute law was now increasing; that as statute law affecting isolated and particular cases was increasing, the consolidation of the law must go on, and that the improvement and simplification of important branches of law comparatively untouched by statute law, such as the law of real property, were from time to time required. Of the various plans of codification, he preferred that proposed by the Lord Chancellor—namely, a digest of the statute and common law, and then its systematic codification; and whether the society agreed with this plan or not, he trusted they would be of opinion that the systematisation of the law was a special work open to the lawyers of this generation.

The Chairman, in alluding to the history of codification, said that the great fault of the Justinian Code was, its want of method and arrangement. The French Civil Code, although it was sometimes unfavourably spoken of, had proved admirable in its working, and had been of much service to those who lived under it. The Americans, following the suggestion of Mr. Bentham, were proceeding to codify their law. The Code of Louisiana was one of great ability, and was written in two languages, to suit the mixed population of the State; and the State of New York was now engaged in this great work. It was proceeding on the plan of entirely remodelling the law, and bringing it up to the standard of abstract perfection, and borrowed freely ideas from foreign countries. That mode was adapted to a country which possessed a strong Government; but in this country, he believed they must follow the plan of the Lord Chancellor: first secure a digestion of the law—that was, a statement of the existing law—to be followed by codification.

Mr. Daniel, Q. C., said, that most lawyers were shocked with the present crude and undigested state of the law. He referred to the evils now arising from the indefinite extent of judicial discretion, and expressed his opinion, that any attempt at codification must be preceded by an arrangement of the existing law.

After some remarks from Mr. R. S. Reilley,

Mr. W. M. Best retained his original opinion, that codification was not desirable, because it was the law of language and not of principle. Custom was the proper basis of the law of any country; and when Rome was great and free the law rested on the same basis as the English law. He admitted the great defects of the present law, and he thought the proper course for the Legislature to pursue was the course of consolidation and amendment. Then if the law was to be codified, the British constitution must be codified; and he asked, if their constitution was written down on a piece of paper what would become of their liberties? (A laugh). Their political liberties could not be attacked at present, because they were so undefined; but if they were reduced to a few systematic propositions they would be much more easily encroached upon.

Mr. C. H. Hopwood said it was remarkable that all opponents of codification were compelled in the end to propose some piecemeal mode of codifying the law. They were not in favour of codification and amendment, and he thought that was a strong argument in favour of the object which the supporters of codification had in view. He thought that a judge would have as much freedom and satisfaction in drawing his inductions from a clear and succinct statement of law as from a variety of scattered and loosely defined decisions. He was sure that all lawyers would feel a comprehensive digest of the law to be an immense relief to their labours.

Mr. J. Williams adverted to a point which had not been noticed, namely, the variety of doubts, and the conflicting opinions which existed on many subjects. A digest and codification of the law were good, but they must be accompanied with legislation. As illustrative of the differences of the present state of the law, he mentioned that on the law of costs there were twenty treatises written, for the purpose of teaching the lawyers how to charge. (A laugh).

After some remarks from Mr. Clark, Mr. Hawkins briefly replied.

A vote of thanks was given to Mr. Hawkins for his able and instructive paper, and the meeting separated.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

HILARY TERM, 28 VICT.—Jan. 23, 1865.

THIS Court will, on Wednesday, the 1st day of February next, and on the three following days, hold sittings, and will proceed in disposing of the cases in the Special and Crown Papers, and any other matters then pending; and will also hold a sitting on Saturday, the 25th day of February next, for the purpose of giving judgments only.

BY THE COURT.

OBSERVATIONS ON A DIGEST OF LAW*.

["The law of England is the greatest grievance of the nation, very expensive and dilatory. There is no end of suits, especially when they are brought into Chancery. . . . There cannot be a worthier design undertaken than to reduce the law into method, to digest it into a body, and to regulate the Chancery so as to cut off the tediousness of suits, and, in a word, to compile one entire system of our laws. Nothing can raise the glory of the Queen's reign more than to see so noble a design set on foot in her time. This would make her name sacred to posterity, which would sensibly feel all the taxes they have raised fully repaid them if the law were made shorter, clearer, more certain, and of less expense."—Bishop Burnet.]

It will be easily understood that the object of the present paper is only to discuss briefly some of the great questions raised by the address at York.

The learned president speaks hesitatingly as to the expediency of an exchange of the English system of case law for a Code, but advocates a Digest †.

Even those who hold a Code to be the ideally perfect form of a nation's law need not, I think, much lament this hesitation. They may well be content to join in the more limited aspiration for a Digest, as the first object.

One reason seems sufficient for regarding codification as impracticable in this country at this time. That reason is furnished by the existence of the conflicting systems of law and equity. As long as they conflict they cannot be combined in a Code. The conflict can only be terminated either by the absorption of one into the other, or by the forcible amalgamation of the two by the action of the Legislature. The former is the work of time; practically, the latter must precede codification, not be attempted as part of it.

I. Let me, then, ask you first to consider the contents of the Digest.

The learned president appears (as I understand him) to have contemplated a Digest of case law merely. He sets out with this proposition:—"With the exception of the Statute of Frauds, the Statute of Limitations, and a few acts directed to very limited objects, the Legislature has laid no hand on the body of the common law."

This is, as it seems to me, to greatly under-estimate the extent and importance of the statutory element of the law. Large branches of the law are of statutory origin exclusively. Take, as an instance, the law of bankruptcy and insolvency. The poor law, again, is an instance; and I mention it to bring to mind that we must not confine our thoughts to those parts of

* A paper by F. S. Reilly, Esq., read before the Department of Jurisprudence, &c., of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, on the 5th December, 1864, with reference to the address delivered at York by Sir James Wilde, President of the Department.

† Sir J. Wilde does not define the terms "Code" and "Digest," but the sense in which he uses them is plain on the face of his address; it is the usual sense; and it is the sense in which the terms are used in this paper.

A Code is the work of the legislative authority; its letter is everything; the French Codes are instances. A Digest is not, or need not be, more than a systematic classification of law. Comyns' Digest and Bacon's Abridgment are mentioned by Sir J. Wilde as works of this kind. A Code makes the law—a Digest merely states it. In the process of codification the law is inevitably altered in some points, and may be altered to any extent that seems expedient. A Digest proper does not, as such, necessarily alter a jot or tittle of the law.

It would be useful if the two terms were used in a uniform way.

the law which come under daily discussion in the superior courts.

In other divisions of the law, though the foundation is laid in the common law, the superstructure has been greatly modified by act of Parliament. Look at the law of real property, for example. Consider how extensively that was recast by the series of acts of William IV; what revolutions had been made in it by the great Statute of Uses, followed by the Statute of Wills. To go further back, let us recollect how the whole system of estates tail has grown up out of an act of Parliament. If you wanted to abolish family settlements, you would simply have to repeal the Statute De Donis.

Commercial law is a branch that has been thrown out from the old trunk of the common law in very modern times, and probably presents itself to the mind as substantially unaffected by acts of Parliament. But the truth is very different. Partnerships and mercantile corporations, insurance, ships, bills of exchange, banking, factors, and brokers—the law under these and many other heads has been greatly modified by legislation.

The history of many rules and practices is habitually lost sight of, and so long as the rule or practice is observed in ordinary course, and seems reasonable, it is assumed to be traditional, or to be founded on common sense; whereas it is often the direct product of a written law.

It might seem that in the system of pleading of a commercial country a plea of set-off must of necessity be as good a plea in discharge, as a plea of accord and satisfaction, and that the plea of set-off had therefore been always allowed by the law of England. But the fact is, that the rule that, where there are mutual debts between plaintiff and defendant, one debt may be set against the other is a purely statutory rule.

I will add two illustrations of a different kind which seem to me rather striking. The calendar of prisoners at a gaol delivery has quite the look of a thing prescribed by modern administrative regulation: it is expressly required by an early statute. Nothing has more the appearance of an ancient common-law proceeding than the giving the royal assent to bills in Parliament by commission under the Great Seal: it depends, however, for its validity on an act of Parliament.

And the sphere of legislation is a continually enlarging one. We have definitively come under the influence of the last of the three agencies pointed out by Mr. Maine (in his book on Ancient Law) as those by which successively law is brought into harmony with society. The days of the domination of legal fiction are gone by; the powers of equity are no longer self-expansive; the authority of legislation is asserting itself more and more.

Even if we look at the case law alone we soon perceive that a very large part of it consists of decisions on the construction and application of acts of Parliament. Such cases cannot be embodied in a Digest unless the effect of the enactments on which they turn is represented there.

I should submit to you, then, that there are two inseparable constituent parts of a Digest. You cannot, in the nature of things, have a Digest of the unwritten law apart from the written law. You cannot, that is, without combining statute law and case law, have a Digest of the character of that which Sir James Wilde contemplates, and such as is alone worthy of being attempted. You may have a scissors-and-paste compilation of marginal notes from the report books, but not such a work as the learned president pictures; one in which (to quote his forcible language)—

"The general principles and broad bases on which our common law reposes, and which tacitly guide the decisions of our courts, [will] be brought to the surface, grouped together, subordinated in their several relations, and contrasted in their differences."

In this combination of case law and statute law, it must be remembered you will have to deal not merely with the reports of the decisions of the three superior courts of law, though the views of the learned president seem almost limited to them. Chancery, Admiralty, Ecclesiastical, and Bankruptcy cases, must all be worked up into a consistent whole. A Digest of case law, as developed on one side of Westminster Hall, would be merely delusive as a representation of the law of England.

Enactments relating to administrative details of business under the management of the different Government departments need not be included in the Digest. They are not so much laws, that is, rules of civil conduct for the people, as instructions issued by Parliament, the Sovereign, to its subordinates, for their official guidance.

One great difficulty of execution would be to hit the just mean between excessive generality and too great detail. The leaning should be to give as much particularity to the contents as possible, consistently with proper compression. Highly generalised propositions are of little practical value in law.

Each proposition deduced from case or statute would, of course, be accompanied by references to authorities; each maxim, by a note of the cases, serving as instances or illustrations of its operation or scope.

In many parts it would be necessary to distinguish what is law in relation to things done, or rights acquired, before a given point of time—for instance, with respect to wills before 1838.

Possibly, in some parts it would be found of advantage to advert to the history of the law. This could be done in a subordinate statement or note, kept distinct from the proposition. There should be no blending of history with statement of result, after the confusing fashion of some treatises.

The heads or divisions should be such as the actual state of the law suggests. They should not be selected on any theory. In other words, the distribution of the contents should be natural, with no attempt at scientific analysis. The work is to be a practical work; and any philosophical classification of human rights and acts (which are the subject of law) is of necessity unpractical.

II.—Next, how is such a work to be accomplished?

The learned president declares his belief, that a Digest, as conceived by him, is within the bounds of reasonable time and labour; but he adds—"I do not conceal from myself that the first judicial minds of the country are alone adequate to the task, at least in its ultimate stages; and that it is far beyond the reach of the unpaid services of occupied men."

I, for one, think it is to be regretted that the learned author of the address did not take the opportunity of inculcating the further truth, that what is wanted first—first in time and first in importance—is the constitution of some permanent superintending authority. Without permanence, we may be convinced, all attempts will be merely disappointing. The work to be done is so extensive and difficult as to demand the devotion for a long series of years of a body of men acting on definite principles, and with a settled plan.

All that is needed in the superintending body would be found (the suggestion is not new*) in a Committee of the Privy Council, organised as the Committee of the Council for Education, with the Lord Chancellor as president, with a paid vice-president sitting in the House of Commons, and with the necessary officers and clerks. To such a committee the law officers of the Crown might be joined as assessors. The first duty of the office would be to investigate the principles on which a Digest should be framed, to lay down rules for its formation, to employ competent persons for the collection and arrangement of materials in the different divisions of the work, and the preparation of drafts, to revise and complete the work, and to issue it with the authority of the Crown.

* To the best of the writer's knowledge, the suggestion was first made some few years ago in an elaborate series of memoranda respecting a Ministry of Justice, prepared for

There would, I conceive, be no difficulty in so regulating the constitution and functions of such a Committee of the Privy Council as to preclude all apprehension of encroachment on the present provinces of the Lord Chancellor and Home Secretary.

When once established, much other work would be found for the department.

There is great need of some better system for the preparation of the bills of the various Government departments. The arrangement, and form, and mode of publication of the sessional collection of acts of Parliament are much in want of supervision. The earlier volumes of the statutes have to be edited, shewing, with other improvements, the results of the work of expurgation which has for some years been going on under the superintendence of the present Lord Chancellor. All these things, for instance, would properly come under the cognisance of such a department. So, too, would the vexed question of law reporting. It might also initiate valuable reforms on subjects (such, for instance, as the uninviting matter of the law of judgments as affecting land) which there is little inducement for any member of the Government, or of either House of Parliament, to take up.

III. Lastly, when the Digest is framed, how is it to be made authoritative?

The learned president states his desire to see the Digest "finally confirmed by act of Parliament." The mode of confirmation intended is not defined. In any form confirmation by act of Parliament would be attended with serious difficulties. If the whole body of English law, in principle and in detail, were to be brought in any manner under review in the Houses of Parliament, a vast number of most grave and delicate subjects would be opened, how and when to be closed no one could tell.

Even if it could be obtained from Parliament, an enactment that the contents of the Digest should be deemed to be law would be inappropriate. A Digest simply expounds the law as it finds it. Exposition is widely different from legislation. A Digest, to be faithful and exhaustive, must often state questions as unsettled, and leave them so. In some way, it must continue the record of the dissents or dubitations of learned members of the Courts by which cases have been decided*. In some way it must indicate the judicial or professional doubts that affect the authority of decisions not absolutely overruled. But all this would be out of place in an act of Parliament. When the Legislature speaks, it must lay down a definite rule, one way or the other.

official consideration, by Mr. Arthur Symonds, which have not been published, but a copy of which, in the possession of a friend of the writer's, he saw in the course of last year.

* As 1 Com. Dig. 471, 4th ed.

"So, a plea to an indictment, when filed, but not upon record, shall be amended; for the Court has power over all before judgment.—R. Holt dub. (Sal. 47).

" . . . Nor a quo warranto.—R. per three J. (Cro. Car. 312); per two J., Hale cont. (2 Lev. 139)."

Again: so far as the Digest was based on statute law, the enactment of it by Parliament would be, to say the least, superfluous. So far as it was based on case law, the enactment of it by Parliament would be a most hazardous operation; that would be the introduction into the case law of an element wholly foreign to its nature.

Assuredly it is not in England that it can be maintained, that the direct action of the Legislature is necessary in order to make law. To maintain this is to deny that case law is law.

A proposal for not only compressing the law into a compendious and rational form, but for also revising and amending it contemporaneously on all points on which it seems to require amendment (the work, when completed, to be enacted as absolute law by Parliament), is a very different proposal from that adopted by Sir J. Wilde. When plainly stated, it must, I conceive, be seen to be impracticable. How long would a Digest of this kind (which, indeed, would have many of the characteristics of a Code) take in execution? Who is to decide on what amendments are desirable? Would the legal profession or the public be satisfied to concede to any body of men a general authority to amend? Certainly not, I think, except on condition of a subsequent parliamentary review of the amendments, a thorough and open discussion of them, in all their details, and in all their bearings—a condition which would practically nullify the concession. It cannot be supposed that any body of men would be allowed to make a Digest of an authoritative kind, on any terms but that of reproducing the law precisely as they find it.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Digest, if it were, as it ought to be, of a purely expository character, would need no legislative confirmation, and that the scheme for its formation should be studiously framed with a view to avoid all necessity for such confirmation.

The Digest should, I submit, be left to rest for such acceptance as it would require at first, merely on its intrinsic merits, and on the fact of its compilation by official authority. For greater solemnity, it might be promulgated by proclamation from the Queen in Council. Copies would be sent by authority to the judges of the superior courts, to county courts and other inferior courts, to quarter sessions and magistrates.

Once issued, it would soon establish itself. It would be turned by night and turned by day in the hands of those concerned to know the law. It would fill a place somewhat like that once filled by Sir E. Coke's writings. Sir E. Coke summarised the Year-books and other early authorities; his summaries were relied on, and the original authorities were so seldom reverted to in ordinary practice, that they were in a manner forgotten. He stood, as it were, between the living and the dead.

And such would be the position of the Digest. It would be cited at the bar and on the bench; it would be prima facie evidence of the law; it would be revised and improved; when thoroughly tested it would, at length, by a natural process, in accordance with the traditions of English case law, without extrinsic aid, become the authority on the law^o.

It might, indeed, then be found convenient to turn some chapters of it into acts of Parliament. And this would be really valuable consolidation, a name which often stands for operations of great risk and difficulty, and of very dubious benefit.

* "I would not that the authority of the cases should necessarily be extinguished by the authority of the Digest. Unless expressly set aside, and inconsistent with other decisions better approved, I would have all decisions remain of authority, content to await the time when the life shall have passed into their offspring, and they fall away of themselves, and pass into a sure decay."—Sir J. Wilde's Address.

At any rate, the result would be, that all parts of the case law condemned as unsound by the Digest, would be discarded as authority, and ultimately would be in effect expunged from the law. And then condensed editions of parts of the reports containing the case law might be published as demand required.

I have thus endeavoured to discuss some points in this great subject, principally those suggested by the address at York, not from any wish to detract from the merits of that address—bespeaking as it does our admiration, not only by its matter, but also by the vigour and the polish of its style—nor for any personal motive. I have offered this paper to your consideration, simply because I think the questions raised by the address cannot be too urgently pressed on the attention of the public, or too often brought before those by whom the opinion of the public may be guided.

While, speculatively, those questions are of the highest interest, the practical importance of the decision come to on them is vast. It concerns not only England but also all those wide parts of the earth where the law of England, immediately or derivatively, exclusively or partially, furnishes the rules of conduct.

To have faced and conquered the difficulties that must attend the recasting of the form of an ancient and voluminous law, would of itself be an honour to England.

The merits of her law would be brought to the surface; now, scarcely is a German explorer gifted with enough of patient labour to dig for them.

If the law of England were made accessible, visible, tangible, it would compete for adoption in countries (not so few as might be supposed) driven by circumstances to import their law in the mass. I noticed not long ago in an English correspondent's letter a suggestion that the new Emperor of Mexico should start by adopting the Codes of France. A country such as Mexico, longing (if I may apply the phrase) to close for itself the era of revolutions, would find in the English law (for example) rules of succession to property on death more favourable to the stability of political institutions (and besides in many respects more reasonable) than the system furnished by the law of France.

The difficulties are undeniably great. They have to be met and overcome. Every candid lawyer must admit that it is merely a question of money. Money will command men and time. The present Lord Chancellor has more than once publicly announced his anxiety to undertake such a work, and he would assuredly go far to accomplish it if proper means were placed at his disposal. Let us have confidence that some statesmen will see it is not less patriotic to find some few thousands a year for a noble and beneficent work of law reform, which would enlighten the people and relieve them from a weight that presses on their progress, than to sink million after million in fencing off the contingent evils of war, which all the while they are almost believing will never come.

REGISTRATION OF WORKS OF LITERATURE, &c., AT STATIONERS HALL.

THE following return has been made to an order of the Hon. the House of Commons, dated the 4th March, 1864:—

The name of the party appointed by the Stationers Company as registering officer of copyrights is Joseph Greenhill, who engages the necessary assistants, and is paid by the fees received by him under the several acts of Parliament. The fees have amounted on an average of the last six years to 436*l.* 11*s.* per annum.

There are three books kept for the purpose of registration, viz.:—

A register of entries of proprietorship, licenses, and assignments, and minutes of consent.

A register of entries of proprietorship under the International Copyright Act.

A register of entries of proprietorship in paintings, drawings, and photographs.

Between the 1st January and the 31st December, 1863, were registered—

British books, 1534. Foreign books, &c., 818.

Works of art, 3611.

The number of assignments registered during the same period was 132.

And the number of certificates furnished was 197.

Registering Officer, Stationers Hall.

ILLEGALITY OF MONASTIC ORDERS.

THE Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice of Appeal have just given judgment in a case arising out of a bequest to monastic institutions, which has taken many very much by surprise, and involves questions and interests of vast importance. Michael John Sims, of Cork, made a will, dated the 15th November, 1861, in which he bequeathed to the Rev. R. White and the Rev. B. T. Russell, of St. Saviour's Catholic Church, Dublin, the sum of 500*l.*, to be applied as they should deem best for the education and maintenance of two priests of the Order of St. Dominic, in Ireland; also 500*l.* to the Rev. P. T. Conway, of St. Mary's Priory, Cork. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice of Appeal pronounced the bequests to be void, not upon any technical defect, or by analogy, but because the purposes for which those bequests were given in trust are illegal, and directly prohibited by statute. The Emancipation Act declares it a misdemeanour for any person to found, or enter into, Jesuit or other religious orders, and provides for their gradual extinction. It imposes highly penal consequences on those who contravene or resist its operation. "The misdemeanour so committed," said the Lord Chancellor, "is of the highest class known to the law." The bequest in the case, accordingly, as one enabling a person to fly in the face of an act of Parliament, was absolutely void. On this narrow ground he held, that the matter was cut short in limine, and that the legacies could not be dealt with under the doctrine of cy-près, or in any other way. The Lord Justice of Appeal is equally unhesitating in his dictum:—"The act said that monastic orders are illegal, and their existence a violation of the law. The testator in the case under notice said, 'It is my object to effect that violation.' Under those circumstances he must hold, that the bequests were totally void." The object of the bequests was to afford means for perpetuating institutions which the Legislature declared ought to be abolished. "It was utterly impossible to read the prohibitory and penal clauses in those enactments without coming to the conclusion, that bequests to continue those orders, so violating the act of Parliament, were void."

The Mail comments as follows on the judgment of their Lordships:—

"We do not know how much property, the distribution of which may be in abeyance, those judgments will affect. We cannot say whether impoverished families and rightful successors, who have already been deprived of their inheritance, are placed by them in a position to recover any portion of their relatives' money from the monastic grasp. But even as controlling such abnormal deathbed dispositions in future, this manly vindication of the law is of the utmost importance. It is, we believe, the conviction of every moderate and right-thinking man, whatever his creed, that such a law ought to exist, for the protection of society from the extravagant growth of monasticism, and the disappointments and miseries attendant upon eccentric bequests made under the terrors of a future world. In this interpretation of what may truly be called the constitution, there has been no setting up of 'a penal law.' As we have already said, the same policy of discountenancing the absorption of property into monastic hands now rules throughout Christendom, as it ruled in England when the Statute of Mortmain was enacted by Roman Catholics in Roman Catholic times. We, therefore, may claim from the public, without distinction, the indorsement of the opinion that monastic orders ought to be checked in the acquisition of property by will. Seeing the mischief they have done in other countries—Roman Catholic countries—their foreign origin, the agency they frequently constitute for political purposes, and the wholly unnatural character of the practice, it is for the interest of society that they should not be fostered. If any proof were needed that the burthen of those impolitic dispositions of property was deeply felt by those most interested, it is surely furnished in the circumstances of the case before us, in which a Roman Catholic gentleman, as residuary legatee, has successfully contested bequests to Dominican clergymen, seeking for the purpose the protection afforded to him by the Emancipation Act."

WESTBURY'S WALK.

[From The Standard, Jan. 25.]

THE Chancellor sat in his easy chair,
With a terrible frown on his brow,
"My Bankruptcy Act is a failure," he said,
"But I know not the why and the how."
"For I framed it myself, with labour and pains, Being learned in England's laws,
And a good double meaning took care to provide For every single clause."
"Yet trade's in a turmoil, the lawyers are posed,
The public is ill at ease,
It must be the fault of the messenger men,
Or else of the assignees."
"For it cannot be in the act itself,
And I so clever and wise!
But it may be well while altering it
To throw dust in the people's eyes."
"O who will go round the courts?" he cried,
"This wrong to ferret and find?"
"Oh, I," said a bold commissioner,
"I'm just to your lordship's mind."
"Give me a man to do the sums
And I'll your commands obey."
A colleague was found, and off they set,
And thus they talked by the way.

* The writer says that the above verses are a faithful account of the late inquiry into "the alleged irregularities in the Bankruptcy Courts," such irregularities being mainly, and in some cases wholly, produced by the ambiguous wording of the act. People are beginning to perceive that there is a "necessary official person" very much wanted—i. e. a reviser of all documents drawn up by the Lord Chancellor, from an act of Parliament down to a familiar epistle to Mr. Paget.

"Oh, the act is a failure it must be owned,
But whoever else may be shamed,
'Tis ours to shield our noble chief,
For little he likes to be blamed."
"So though the expenses are very much more,
And the profits are very much less,
And the fraudulent debtor's the only man
That Lord Westbury's name can bless;
"While the honest one's in a woful plight,
And the creditor rants and raves,
We must turn the wrath from the Chancellor's head Upon those of the messenger knaves."
"And though the act is a failure, still,
As no discredit must be
To its author attached—we'll heap it upon Each villainous assignee."
The books were opened, accounts gone through,
And the messengers shook in their shoes,
For their salaries were not so over high
That they'd very much money to lose.
It was found that they'd charged their railway fares,
And the beer that their men had had,
And the paper their lists were taken upon—
All which was terribly bad.
But things looked blacker and blacker still
In the case of the assignees;
For they'd done—what they had had leave to do—
Had pocketed various fees
For cases with which they had dealt before
The act ever came into force.
Having done the old work, they were told the old pay
Was theirs as a matter of course.
But the chief inquisitor foamed at the mouth
With virtuous indignation,
And the shortest word that he spoke was "fraud,"
And the longest was "peculation."
"You'll all of you pay some hundreds of pounds!"
Thus issued his stern decree.
"What, back to the bankrupts' estate?" "No; to The commissioners' fund," said he.
Moreover, this pleasant alternative To each trembling wight he gave—
"If you don't, the Lord Chancellor 'll turn you out;
If you do, you'll be called a knave!"
The victims must brook these merciless terms,
Or their homes be desolate made.
So they ground their teeth with a bitter curse,
And then—the money was paid.
The two inquisitors hied them back,
And together did pleasantly dine,
And cooily sat in agreeable chat
Over their walnuts and wine.
"Our work has been done pretty well," said one;
"It was dirtyish work," said the other;
"Oh, pooh! if you'd rise in the world," he replies,
"You must learn such scruples to smother."
"What matters the rage of a dozen men,
Or the tears of their dozen wives?
What though we have laid a wearyish load
On a few insignificant lives?
"Though the charge of fraud to an honest man
Torture of tortures be?
Though some are half ruined, and one is gone mad
With grief and anxiety?
"Yet we've served our noble Chancellor well—
That cleverest, wisest of men!
By throwing the blame on the underlings,
While he frames his act again!"

RECENTLY PUBLISHED WORKS BY
JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q. C.

Editor of Fearn and of Mitford, and One of the Consolidators of the Chancery Orders.

A COMPENDIUM OF THE LAW OF REAL AND PERSONAL PROPERTY, CONNECTED WITH CONVEYANCING.

DESIGNED AS A COMPREHENSIVE SECOND BOOK FOR STUDENTS, AND AS A
DIGEST OF THE MOST USEFUL LEARNING FOR PRACTITIONERS.

By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q. C.

THIRD EDITION. In one very thick vol. 8vo. 1865. Price 35s.

"As a refresher to the memory, and a repository of information that is wanted in daily practice, it will be found of great value."—Jurist, April 5, 1856.

"It will be seen from this outline, that the work is extremely well planned; the topics are arranged in the natural order as they flow out of one another, and thus immensely aid the reader's memory. He writes like a man who is master of his theme, clearly and concisely."—Law Times, Dec., 1855.

"A portly, admirable volume. . . . He has given to the student a book which he may read over and over again with profit and pleasure."—Law Times, Jan. 21, 1865.

"The work before us will, we think, be found of very great service to the practitioner."—Solicitors' Journal, January 21, 1865.

A MANUAL OF EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE,

Founded on the Works of Story, Spence; and other Writers, and on the subsequent Cases: comprising the Fundamental Principles, and the Points of Equity usually occurring in General Practice. SEVENTH EDITION. In 12mo. 1864. Price 12s. cloth.

"Mr. Josiah Smith may claim the praise of reviving a compendious form of legal literature which was adopted by the best legal writers of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. . . . The success of the book may be found in the answer to the question, What would the student do without some such short treatise? . . . In the present, the whole scope of equity is brought into view in a clear and just relation between its parts, on a reduced scale. The result is admirably small in bulk; but the Author's labour necessary for such a result, even after his advantages of discipline as Editor of Fearn and Mitford, was far from small. . . . But there is another class of learners; for a lawyer is a learner all his life. . . . They can at once put their hand on a principle, exact in its definition, and well ordered as to its place, in the Manual. . . . To sum up all in one word, for the student and the juriconsult, the Manual is the nearest approach to an equity code that the present literature of the law is able to furnish."—Law Times, Jan. 16, 1864.

"It will be found as useful to the practitioner as to the student."—Solicitors' Journal, Jan. 2, 1864.

"Mr. Smith's Manual has fairly won for itself the position of a standard work. Its great utility to the student has long been acknowledged; and the present edition has been made peculiarly valuable to practitioners."—Jurist, Jan. 30, 1864.

"It is almost impossible to over-rate the value of Mr. Smith's Manual."—Leguleian, Hil. Term, 1864.

"There is no disguising the truth; the proper mode to use this book is to learn its pages by heart; that is to say, such a familiarity should be sought with each paragraph as to render it a part of those possessions of the mind which form portions, as it were, of the mind itself, or rather of that apparatus which the mind unconsciously uses in framing its judgment on each subject. . . . In conclusion, we must express our satisfaction that Mr. Smith has, by his literary labours, and especially by his share in framing the Consolidated Orders, earned for himself a distinction coveted by the most eminent advocate."—Law Magazine and Review, May, 1861.

A MANUAL OF COMMON LAW. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q. C.

SECOND EDITION. In 12mo. 1864. Price 12s. 6d. cloth.

This Work is founded on about Seventy Text-books, and comprises the Fundamental Principles, and the Points most usually occurring in daily life and practice.

Notices of the First Edition.

"The 'Manual of Common Law' is peculiarly suitable for the careful study of law students. . . . Practising lawyers will find the book a valuable vade mecum."—Solicitors' Journal.

"Admirably conceived and executed. . . . Eminently lucid and concise. . . . A pocket-book of pith and essence of common law."—Leguleian.

Notices of the Second Edition.

"Mr. Josiah Smith possesses, in an eminent degree, that kind of logical skill which exhibits itself in the simple arrangement, but exhaustive division, of wide and complicated subjects, and is, moreover, gifted with the rare power of accurate condensation."—Solicitors' Journal, April 30, 1864.

"Mr. Smith is entitled to the gratitude of the student. . . . It seems prepared with the care and accuracy generally exhibited by the Author."—Law Magazine, May, 1864.

"It may be considered' (allly observes Mr. Josiah Smith) 'as simply an attempt to supply a vacant place.' Lucky the author who in these days can spy out a vacancy anywhere; and, moreover, knows how to fill it."—Law Times, May 28, 1864.

"To more advanced students, and to the practitioner, whether barrister or attorney, we think the 'Manual of Common Law' a most useful and convenient companion. . . . It is compiled with the scrupulous care and the ability which distinguish Mr. Smith's previous works."—Jurist, July 30, 1864.

A MANUAL OF BANKRUPTCY. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q. C.

In 12mo. 1864. Price 5s. cloth.

"Very valuable as a first book for students."—Solicitors' Journal, Dec. 18, 1864.

"To the student it is simply invaluable."—Leguleian, Mich. Term, 1864.

INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCE,

"The essential feature of an Indisputable Policy is, that it is granted on one condition, that the person assured 'is now living.' Such is the form of expression devised by that astutest of lawyers the present Lord Chancellor, to exclude all questions of fraud or misrepresentations. The Society (the Indisputable Life Assurance) appears to act on this principle; and we are glad to learn that their financial condition is such as we should have anticipated from the carrying on of their business on what are obviously sound as well as equitable principles."—JOURNAL OF JURISPRUDENCE, December, 1864.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 4, 1865.

THE session of Parliament will in a few days commence, and at present there seems to be no expectation of any political question arising which will lead to a trial of strength, or a premature dissolution. We might, therefore, reasonably look forward to the introduction and passing of useful social measures, and especially of such measures of law reform as are acknowledged to be necessary. If it is the intention of the Government to introduce any such measures, they have hitherto kept it secret; if it is not, it is to be hoped that some of the many legal Members of Parliament will exert themselves to effect those improvements in the law which are most urgently required.

First and foremost is a bill to amend the law of bankruptcy. Lord Westbury's Act has proved itself a failure. Its defects, very soon after it came into operation, created murmurs of dissatisfaction, which have become louder and louder, till at last they have grown into a general cry of complaint. The judges themselves speak with some bitterness of the defects in the act; and the numerous deeds of arrangement, under sect. 192, which they have been compelled to hold invalid, point to the necessity of these provisions being made more clear and intelligible to those whose duty it is to frame these deeds. As it has been decided, and we think rightly and reasonably, that a cessio bonorum is not necessary for the validity of a deed of assignment, it is still more imperative upon the Legislature to protect the rights of non-assenting creditors. It cannot be impossible to frame a model deed, which, with certain alterations and modifications applicable to each particular case, it should be the duty of the parties to adopt. There are in the House of Commons gentlemen quite alive to the necessity of amending this part of the bankruptcy law, and quite competent to effect the amendment, and they would do good service to the country if they would earnestly apply themselves to the work. Another great ground of complaint is the expense of working a bankruptcy. Lord Westbury, when he introduced the measure, spoke with great force of the enormous cost which in the then state of the law was incurred, and of the large amount of assets which were wasted, before anything was realised to the creditors. We hear the same complaints of his own pet measure. In fact, without going at great length into the subject, we think it may be said, that no one person can be found conversant with the working of the bankruptcy law who would not say that it requires extensive amendment. If this be the case, we may surely hope that the Legislature will take up the subject vigorously and speedily.

Another branch of the law which by common consent requires amendment is the law of patents; not so much with reference to the law itself, which regulates the granting of patents, as with reference to the nature of the tribunal whose duty it is to try patent cases. A committee has been sitting upon the subject, but we are not aware that they have propounded any scheme for remedying the evil. It constantly happens that a patent cause occupies three or four days, or even more; day after day a jury, selected without any reference to their scientific acquirements, listen with yawns and despair to scientific witnesses contradicting each other, and eventually the judge has cast upon him the duty of extracting from all this evidence, in the best way he can, the points upon which the jury have to give their verdict. He may or may not be a man of science; at all events, it is only in rare instances that a judge can keep up his knowledge of science, and have it fresh and ready to be applied to the case before him. It is almost a wonder that a judge has not already sunk under the exhaustion of trying a patent cause. Perhaps when this does take place, the Legislature will think it is time to substitute a more appropriate tribunal. Some of the Vice-Chancellors have lately experienced the labour of trying such causes, and they can add their testimony to the necessity for an alteration in the mode of trial. Here, then, is another subject of law reform on which the time of the Legislature may be usefully employed.

The Divorce Court is also a subject which, we venture to think, deserves the gravest consideration. It is not to be denied that the poor, equally with the rich, are entitled to avail themselves of this court; nor is it to be denied that, as a general rule, it is right that courts of justice should be open to the public. But we would ask any thinking person whether the publication of the evidence, which is daily given in this court, is not a curse to the community? The daily papers circulate through the country details of adulteries, which must tend to corrupt. We need only refer to the two recent cases of Codrington v. Codrington and Chetwynd v. Chetwynd to prove the truth of this assertion. It is, no doubt, a very difficult question to deal with. One sweeping mode of amendment would be to abolish the law of divorce, and make the marriage union indissoluble—a measure which many persons think would tend to check adultery when marriage with the adulterer was impossible; but in a Protestant country such a measure is not to be expected. Another plan by which the publication of these details would be prevented is to exclude the public from the court, but this would be declared unconstitutional. There is a middle course, namely, that the judge should have the power, when he thinks proper, of excluding the public from the court. This was proposed a few years since, but rejected by the House of Commons, at the instigation, we believe, of Mr. Edwin James. Perhaps, as the evil effect of the publication of these trials is now more extensively acknowledged, some such provision would be allowed to pass. There are rumours that an alteration is likely to be made in the constitution of this court, namely, that on the retirement of the present judge of the Admiralty Court, that and the Probate Court will be united under one judge, while the Divorce Court will have an assistant judge to aid the present judge of the court, under the increasing quantity of divorce business. Whether or not an assistant judge is required, we think it clear that the divorce business and probate business are too much for one man; and that the separation of the two courts is, at all events, necessary. It is false policy to overwork a judge for the sake of a small saving; and the same remark will apply to the Common-law Courts—in two of which, at all events, the judges have too much to do. It has been proposed to distribute the business over the three courts, so that one of them shall not be comparatively idle while the other two are overworked. But we think that, considering the increasing business and commerce of the country, there is likely to be work enough for three courts, and that the proper course would be to increase the number of the judges of the superior courts. This would remedy the delay which takes place in the trial of cases at Guildhall, where the arrears are a real and serious evil—an evil which at present there is no hope of curing; the judges do their best to clear the lists, but they can only sit for a limited time, and it is only by referring so many cases to arbitration that any effect is produced upon the lists.

This last observation leads us to another subject on which, we think, the Legislature might well apply themselves, namely, the expediency of creating courts of arbitration. We have already discussed the subject in this Journal, and we believe it to be one which has been much discussed in the Profession—a certain number of judicial arbitrators trying causes from day to day, without the delays which occur in the present system of arbitration, would clear off a large number of causes. The business would be distributed among them impartially; they would render the attendance of counsel and parties compulsory, as it is at Nisi Prius, and they would not be subject to the application for adjournments and postponements to which legal arbitrators are now exposed, and to which they cannot help yielding. The appointment of such courts of arbitration would of course be attended with some expense, but when compared with the income of the country it would be but trifling; and it would very much aid in curing the grievous delay which everybody conversant with the business at Guildhall must acknowledge.

These several subjects of law reform deserve the consideration of Parliament. It cannot well entertain a subject more deserving consideration than efficient laws, and the efficient administration of these laws. It is a subject on which party spirit need have no influence, and when there are so many able lawyers members of the Legislature, it is somewhat of a reflection upon them, that defects, acknowledged by all to be serious and increasing, should be allowed to continue.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE.—The first meeting of the Reformatory Section of the Department of Jurisprudence and Amendment of the Law, will be held at 1, Adam-street, Adelphi, on Monday next, the 6th inst., when a paper will be read by Captain Cartwright, on "Prison Discipline." The committee of the section will meet at 7 o'clock, and the chair will be taken at 8 o'clock.

LAW REPORTING.

At a pension of the Benchers of Gray's Inn, held on the 25th January, 1865, upon taking into consideration (pursuant to adjournment) the communication made to this society by the Attorney-General on the subject of law reporting, and also upon reading and considering the resolutions of the Honourable Societies of Lincoln's Inn and the Middle Temple respectively upon the same subject, it was resolved,

That this society regret that they have not sufficient confidence in the scheme to induce them to join in it.

Ordered, that this resolution be communicated to each of the other Inns of Court.

On the 27th January, 1865, the Bench of the Inner Temple (with the resolution of Gray's Inn, as well as those of Lincoln's Inn and of the Middle Temple before them) unanimously passed resolutions approving of the scheme of the Bar Committee, in the same terms as those of Lincoln's Inn and the Middle Temple, already published.

At a council of the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, held on the 31st January, 1865, the communications received from the other Inns of Court on the subject of law reporting, viz. resolution of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple, dated the 20th January inst.; resolution passed by the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn, on the 25th January; and resolution of the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple, dated the 27th January, were read; and it was resolved,

1. That, while regretting the determination of Gray's Inn not to join in the scheme, this society is willing to concur with the Inner Temple and Middle Temple alone in giving the guarantee mentioned in the fourth rule of the scheme; each of the three societies^o guaranteeing two-sevenths of the 500l. per annum, and to nominate two members of the Council, proposed by the first rule.

2. That, at the adjourned council, to be holden on Wednesday, the 15th February next, this society will proceed to elect two members of the Council under rule 1.

Ordered, that these resolutions be communicated to the other Inns of Court, and to Serjeants' Inn and the Incorporated Law Society.

MARITIME INTERNATIONAL LAW.—The last of a course of lectures on this subject was delivered on Wednesday, in the hall of Lincoln's-inn, to the members of the Inns of Court, by Leone Levi, Esq., LL.D., Professor of Commercial Law at King's College, London; Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., her Majesty's Attorney-General, in the chair. The subject of the lecture was "Neutral Rights." After defining what is neutrality, the professor dwelt on the rights and duties of neutrals as regards trade and navigation, illustrating the bearings of the rule of 1756, and commenting on the law of nations prohibiting the carrying of contraband of war and selling of articles of war to belligerents in a neutral country. The Foreign Enlistment Act in force in this country and in the United States was carefully expounded, as well as the points involved in the dispute regarding The Alabama, The Alexandra, &c. The professor lamented the practice of contraband carriers and blockade runners dealing, as they did, against both the law of nations and municipal law. He shewed the great advantage of adopting the principle of "free ship, free goods," dwelt on the importance of preserving the immunity of neutral territory, and concluded with recapitulating the principal points of the previous lectures. At the conclusion, the Attorney-General moved a vote of thanks to the professor, both in the name of those who attended the lectures and of the Council of Legal Education. He said that, whatever difference of opinion there might be on the points that had formed the subjects of this course of lectures, it would not be doubted that it was a great benefit to have these important questions so well matured and discussed; and thanks were due to the professor for devoting so much learning and time in the elucidation of these subjects.

The Dorchester magistrates have decided that apples are not agricultural produce, and therefore not exempt from toll when conveyed by horse and cart through turnpike gates.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.

THE CONSOLIDATED GENERAL ORDERS of the HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY; with Regulations as to certain Fees and Charges.

"The new arrangement of the Orders leaves nothing to be wished for: it is clear, convenient, and admirably adapted for the purposes of practice. Although the language of the old Orders has been adhered to as far as possible, it has been altered whenever it was found necessary for the purpose of adapting them to the present practice, and also for the purpose of removing those doubts and difficulties which so frequently arose under the old Orders."—Jurist, Jan. 21, 1860.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 11, 1866.

In a late article, containing a short sketch of the more important statutes passed during the last session of Parliament, we stated that many important bills had also been brought in, which, for lack of time, had not been proceeded with. To one of these bills we wish to draw our readers' attention, because of the importance of its subject matter, the alterations it contemplates, and the almost inevitable imperfections of its execution; and because, whilst on the one hand it is, therefore, desirable that this or some similar bill should be actively promoted; on the other, it is equally a matter of moment that such bill should be most critically examined as to its emendations, its omissions, and its possible blunders. The bill is intitled "A Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts regulating Procedure before Justices of the Peace out of Quarter Sessions;" and those who are at all conversant with the subject will at once perceive, how large a field is presented both for useful legislation and for legislative blundering. As it contains 145 sections, some of which contain a dozen (or even more) lengthy subdivisions, we cannot pretend to make more than a very cursory sketch of the general nature of the provisions which it contains; and we must leave to our readers themselves all critical examination.

It is divided into fourteen parts, and has three schedules of tables of fees, forms, and repealed statutes respectively. The first part relates to the jurisdiction and authority of justices, and contains provisions as to their power to act out of their jurisdiction; as to their jurisdiction in summary proceedings for offences on the boundaries of counties, during a journey, &c., and in respect of indictable offences; as to what shall be considered an interested justice; and as to the number of justices required to act. Some of these provisions are new, and some are made general, which formerly applied only to particular cases, but they call for no especial remark. The second part relates to the fees and duties of justices' clerks, and, on the whole, seems to be fair and reasonable. The third provides for the manner of preferring complaints and charges; and the most material clause is one which limits the time for preferring complaints within part 8 (as to summary proceedings), to six months, where there is no special limitation by act of Parliament, except in the case of non-payment of rates and taxes when the limitation is twelve months; and which defines the time from which the limitation is to run. Parts 4 and 5 relate to the methods by which the accused and witnesses may be compelled to attend, and by which the latter may be compelled to give evidence, and they contain many salutary provisions and amendments in these matters. The sixth part deals with the adjournment of cases, and allows the justices ample discretion to commit to prison, bail, or merely take the defendant's promise to appear; one thing we do not, however, quite understand, viz. the object of the provision, that when bail is taken, the remand may be for a "shorter" time than eight days, and think it will lead to much misconstruction. In part 7, as to the place of, and proceedings at, the hearing, there are directions as to where petty sessions may be held; what things must be done in them; where they are to be considered an open court and where not, in both of which cases the defendant may have counsel or attorney; as to the committal, &c. for contempt; the proceedings, if perjury is committed; and the non-abatement of proceedings in case of the death of the complainant, or his removal if he be a constable. Parts 8, 9, and 10 respectively apply to the cases of summary jurisdiction, indictable offences where an indictment is eventually to be preferred, and indictable offences which are intended to be summarily disposed of. The provisions in each case are so extremely lengthy, that, much as we desire it, we shall be unable to point out the various important alterations made by them. In part 8 there is an elaborate provision as to the cases to which it shall apply; its object is really, as it appears, to apply to all cases not within the next two parts, but the provision, as drawn, seems likely to produce considerable difficulty. There are enactments also as to when a person may be proceeded against, although he has been illegally brought before the justices, and as to what is to be done when title, &c. comes in question. The whole proceedings at the hearing (in civil cases portions of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, are to apply), the manner of adjudication, method of punishment (alternative or otherwise), and appeal, are elaborately entered into; and the changes in these matters are very great, and will require considerable attention. Part 9 is very nearly identical with the present procedure, and we will only point out, that although by part 7 counsel or attorney are to be allowed to the accused, the terms of this part only provide for cross-examination by the accused himself. Part 10 is in substitution of the present Summary Procedure Act in Cases of Larceny; but besides the alteration in the clauses relating to procedure, it provides for an enormous extension of the summary jurisdiction in indictable offences;—where the offender is under sixteen, additional jurisdiction is given in almost every case in the nature of simple larceny, in certain embezzlements, false pretences, and receipts of property; and in every such case, although there has been a previous conviction (unless penal servitude is a consequence);—and where the offender is above sixteen, there is an additional jurisdiction given, both in the discretionary and optional cases. Parts 11, 12, and 13 deal with special sessions, warrants, and recognisances, and require attentive perusal. And part 14 repeals a number of acts, the most important of which are Jervis's acts, the Criminal Justice Act, the act as to the stating of cases by justices, and the portions of the Criminal Consolidation Acts which relate to proceedings at petty sessions; and it contains a number of miscellaneous provisions of greater or less importance.

This slight sketch will shew that we have not exaggerated the importance of the proposed addition to our statute-book, and the necessity of not allowing such addition to take place without the most critical examination, not merely of a parliamentary committee, but also of all justices of the peace, lawyers, and those of the general public who are conversant with petty sessional proceedings. And we hope that our readers will hold us justified in drawing their attention (if not already directed) to the bill, and in thus giving them the opportunity of considering the provisions for themselves, and of watching any proceedings which may take place in Parliament with respect to it.

Notwithstanding, as is obvious, we have no space, either for criticism of its provisions, or suggestions for its improvement, we cannot refrain, before concluding, in making one suggestion; viz. that, if possible, some definition should be laid down of what is a civil and what a criminal proceeding. At present it is very difficult to determine this matter, and it is very desirable to have some clear rule, as the methods of procedure in the two cases are so different.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—In your impression of last Saturday, it is stated that, notwithstanding the refusal of Gray's Inn to join in the scheme originated by Mr. Daniel, and adopted by a majority of the bar committee on law reporting, the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn will proceed on the 15th instant, to elect two members of the Council under rule 1. It is a proverbial saying, "Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat," and it does seem sheer infatuation on the part of the advocates of this scheme, that they are unable to see that the Council of rule 1 is practically defeated, and that, in order that the resolution of the Benchers should have had any sensible meaning, the indefinite article, in connexion with the word "Council" ought to have been used; for what scheme is it that the united Inns of the Inner Temple, Middle Temple, and Lincoln's Inn propose to carry out? Certainly not that approved at the last meeting of the Bar, since, according to that scheme, the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn were to appoint one member of the Council. Is it not most irregular, if not indecorous, on the part of the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, to attempt to proceed further in this matter, without submitting to a general meeting of the Bar the grave and deliberate decision of Gray's Inn? It would, indeed, be an extraordinary act of the Legislature, if, as rule 4 of the scheme suggests, as to the constitution of the Council originally contemplated, any such body, assuming to represent the Inns of Court, but without any representative from Gray's Inn, should be "incorporated by act of Parliament or charter!" The Legislature will, very probably, interfere, but not for the purpose of sustaining a project that is not an expression of the unanimous sentiments of the Inns of Court. I should regret to think that any Government would condescend to purchase for their Lord Chancellor, or that his Lordship would accept, the right of appointing two members of the proposed Council, as is suggested in rule 25, by and in consideration of the loan of the first moiety of the salaries of the editors and reporters. If the Government are to be repaid within the year (a repayment which must take place, or the editors and reporters will never receive the second moiety of their salaries), why are they to inherit this privilege? On the other hand, if the Consolidated Fund, or in other words, the public generally, must subscribe and lose this amount, what corresponding advantage is derived from sending two members to this mysterious Council which presides over another unauthorised series of law reports? It is worthy of remark, as an evidence of the low degree of confidence which the projectors themselves entertain, with reference to the ultimate prospects of their undertaking, that it must be the Government or the printers and publishers, that incur the risk of the payment of the first moieties of the salaries in question. Whatever the scheme asks or expects the Inns of Court to guarantee, it shrinks altogether from suggesting a joint responsibility on their behalf exceeding the sum of 500*l.* annually. If Mr. Daniel persist in launching his vessel under such inauspicious portents, those who embark with him must have very sanguine temperaments; in fact, his three hundred subscribers (if the number be such) must accomplish as great feats as their famed predecessors of classic notoriety at Thermopylae. An arithmetical deficit is a difficult matter to handle; argue how we may, fifteen hundred guineas are not ten thousand like glittering coins; nor are the confidence and approval of a few the confidence and approval of the many. Meanwhile, the judges, as a body, remain quite impassive, and even insensible, to the angry billows that roll around their judicial seats. The nearest approach, as I believe, to anything like judicial action has been made by Sir J. Stuart, V. C., who lately refused to follow a case that was cited from "THE JURIST," because it was not in the regular reports, and counsel had not "compared it with the record;" but the Vice-Chancellor, somewhat incongruously, qualified this proceeding by stating that he, for his part, did not join in the general outcry against the irregular reports, as he considered them useful in suggesting inquiry;—in fact, Sir, if I may presume to explain the meaning of his Honor by a figurative expression—you are allowed to hunt the wary fox "precedent," but the regulars must have his brush. The Bar, I fear, is in a lamentable condition, in connexion with the subject of reporting, for the remedy that is suggested reveals the lower depths to which we have fallen. It appears to be impossible, if Mr. Daniel rightly enunciates our sentiments, to say, fairly and plainly, to a number of well-meaning gentlemen who love reporting, "We do not want you, and will buy you out of the field of competition;" but cloudy visions of compensation out of imaginary funds are suffered to float agreeably before the mental eye of the irregulars, whilst the regular reporters are propitiated by the offer of one moiety of salaries which are still inadequate, and by the promise of the remaining moiety after payment of all expenses, the guaranteed 500*l.*, and the loan, whether obtained from the Government or the printers and publishers. It is self-evident that the scheme is wholly constructed on a wrong basis. Remove competition by a competent authority, and any series of reports must succeed; but the bar committee, or those members of it that approve of the scheme expect by its success to exclude competition—the inverse of the process I have mentioned, and a principle of action most unlikely to answer. Moreover, as Mr. Daniel publicly stated at the last general meeting of the Bar, and even boasted, that his scheme was strictly and simply commercial, and by no means repudiated that imputation, I trust sincerely that the event will prove that a scheme so constituted does not rest upon such a footing as will gain for it the adherence of the members of the bar generally, who, while they cannot but see the evils of the present unrestricted mode of reporting, are not unmindful of the hard-worked and ill-paid votaries, or rather victims, thereof, and are not disposed by a side-wind, as it were, or, by means of a self-constituted monopoly, unauthorised by the Legislature, to deprive any of the existing reporters, regular or irregular, without compensation, of the inadequate earnings of much patient industry.

Your obedient servant,
Rolls Chambers, Chancery-lane, G. L.
Feb. 7, 1865.

[It is well that the objection to the late resolution of Lincoln's Inn, which we have heard privately expressed, should be stated publicly, and disposed of. If the history of the vote of want of confidence, passed at Gray's Inn, were explained, it would probably not be found worthy of so much respect as in the abstract may appear to be due to it; but taking it at the highest estimate, it certainly cannot justify the promoters of the bar committee scheme in abandoning the undertaking which has been intrusted to them. The Bar has unmistakeably expressed its desire and determination to have an amendment of the existing system by some such means as that proposed by the committee, under the sanction and guidance of the four Inns of Court, and the Incorporated Law Society, if possible; and certainly it does not desire or intend that the attempt should be defeated, merely by the opposition or inertia of the most insignificant of those bodies, to whom, in any event, not more than a ninth voice was proposed to be conceded.]

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.

THE Examiners reported that the following gentlemen, whose names are arranged in alphabetical order, have passed the intermediate examination with distinction:—

Francis Henry Kendall, aged nineteen, articled to Mr. William Venn, of London.

Thomas John Webb, aged nineteen, articled to Messrs. Partridge & Woodward, of Birmingham.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 77; of these, 65 were passed, and 12 postponed.

By order of the Council,
E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the Superior Courts, the Examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of twenty-six, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

I.

1. John Nalder, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Mr. Frank Isaac Nalder, of Shepton Mallett.

2. William Henry Hodson, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Nowell & Priestley, of Barton-upon-Humber, and Mr. William Hunt, of London.

3. John Reginald Lane, aged twenty-four, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Lane, of Stratford-upon-Avon, and Messrs. Routh, Rowdon, & Stacey, of London.

II.

4. William Plumer Keary, aged twenty-two, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Mee, Burnaby, & Denman, of East Retford.

5. William Wright Kirkman, aged twenty-two, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Beaver, Darwell, & Taylor, of Manchester.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following Prizes of Books:—
To Mr. Nalder, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn.

To Mr. Hodson, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clement's Inn.

To Mr. Lane, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Keary, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Kirkman, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

Charles Bell, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Mr. Nathaniel Cobham, of Ware.

Arthur Bird, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Bowker & Peake, of London.

William Robert Brooks, aged twenty-three, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Thomson & Son, of London.

James William Clabburn, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Brightwell, jun., of Norwich, and Mr. Charles Edward Abbott, of London.

Thomas Henry Lambert, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Messrs. J. & W. Galsworthy, of London, and Mr. Mark Shephard, of London.

Richard Bailey Pugh, aged twenty-three, who served his clerkship to Mr. Richard Pugh, of Watford, and Mr. Henry Drake, of London.

George William Thomas, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Rice & Wighton, of Boston, and Messrs. Scott & Co., of London.

Robert Trimmer, aged twenty-one, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Hobbs & Collins, of Reading, and Messrs. Jenkins & Abbott, of London.

William Wood, jun., aged twenty-two, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Roberts, of Manchester.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The Examiners have further announced to the following candidates, that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes or certificates of merit if they had not been above the age of twenty-six:—

1. Ambrose Gibbons Ditton.
2. Horatio Seymour Warwick.
3. William Groves, B.A.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 139; of these 120 were passed, and 19 postponed.

By order of the Council,
E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

Law Society's Hall, Chancery-lane,
London, Feb. 1, 1865.

BAR PROMOTIONS.—It is stated that Mr. Joseph Browne, of the Home Circuit; Mr. Webster, Sir Thomas Philips, and Mr. Milward, of the Northern Circuit; and Mr. Hardinge Giffard, of the South Wales Circuit, are to be raised to the rank of Queen's Counsel; and that Mr. Colley Robinson, of the Home Circuit, is to take the coif.

The Queen has been pleased, by letters-patent under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, to give and grant the office of one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas to Montague Edward Smith, Serjeant-at-Law, on the resignation of Sir Edward Vaughan Williams, Knt., late one of the Justices of the said Court. His Lordship took his seat on the bench for the first time on Wednesday last.

THE CHURCH AND THE BAR.—Some weeks since a paragraph appeared in the Times, stating that a question of considerable importance to members both of the Church and the Bar was under the consideration of the Benchers of the Inner Temple. It was, whether a duly ordained clergyman of the Church of England was eligible to be called to the degree of barrister-at-law, and to practice in our courts of justice. At the time the name of the clergyman whose proceedings had given rise to the inquiry was not mentioned; but there will be no impropriety in now stating that the gentleman referred to is the Rev. F. H. Lascelles, M.A., formerly a beneficed clergyman of the Church of England, and a near connexion of the family of the Earl of Harewood. Mr. Lascelles was ordained about eighteen years ago, and served several offices in the Church. Becoming dissatisfied with his ecclesiastical position, he gave up, as far as he was able to do so by law, his connexion as a clergyman with the Church, and was admitted, on the recommendation of Mr. Locke, Q.C., M.P. for Southwark, a student of the Inner Temple. He kept the usual terms, and about two years ago was called to the Bar, the Benchers being at the time unaware that he had taken holy orders. When their attention was directed to the matter, the Benchers instituted an inquiry, and called to their assistance the Benchers of the other courts. The following gentlemen were appointed to institute the necessary inquiries:—Lincoln's Inn: Mr. Loftus T. Wigram (treasurer), Sir E. B. Ryan, Mr. E. B. Denison, Q.C., Mr. Bazalgette, Q.C., Mr. R. Amphlett, Q.C., and Dr. Travers Twiss. Inner Temple: Mr. K. Macanlay, Q.C., Dr. Lushington, Mr. J. A. Roebuck, Mr. R. Gurney, Q.C., Mr. R. Ingham, Q.C., and Mr. Samuel Warren, Q.C. Middle Temple: Mr. H. R. Bagshawe, Q.C. (treasurer), Sir W. T. Alexander, Q.C., Mr. Montague Smith, Q.C., Sir R. J. Phillimore, the Queen's Advocate, Mr. J. D. Coleridge, Q.C., and Mr. Greenwood, Q.C. Gray's Inn: Mr. W. Wilde (treasurer), Mr. J. W. Huddleston, Q.C., Mr. R. Lush, Q.C., Mr. H. Manisty, Q.C., Mr. W. Hindmarch, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Stephens, Q.C. These gentlemen, having carefully inquired into the matter, held their last meeting on Monday evening, when they came to a decision, Dr. Lushington and Mr. M. Smith (the new judge) declining, on account of their position, to express an opinion, it was decided, on a division, that ordained clergymen should henceforth be eligible for call to the Bar, and Mr. Lascelles, consequently, may continue to practise. It is understood that the main argument of the minority, and that chiefly relied upon by Sir R. Phillimore, Mr. Coleridge, and Mr. Samuel Warren, was grounded on the 76th canon, which declares, that "no man being admitted a deacon or minister shall from thenceforth voluntarily relinquish the same, nor afterwards use himself as a layman, upon pain of excommunication." On the other hand, it was argued, that the exclusiveness of this canon is to a great extent repealed by the act passed in the second year of her Majesty's reign, called the Pluralities Act. In that statute, brought in and passed by the heads of the Church, there are several enactments sanctioning clergymen occupying themselves in secular pursuits, and among others the directors and managers of insurance and other companies. Many clergymen have complained, during the last few years, that they have been unable to enter any other profession, on becoming dissatisfied with their position in the Church. Such difficulties are now to some extent removed; and probably, as soon as the Benchers' decision becomes known, there will be many applications to the Inns of Court for admission from clergymen who are anxious to aspire to legal honours. At the present time there are some clergymen who are practising at the Bar, but these are gentlemen who were called before they were ordained. Mr. Lascelles is the first barrister, as far as present inquiries shew, who has been called after taking holy orders.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 18, 1865.

THE recent judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in the case of Lee and Others v. Jones (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 81), well deserves consideration. The facts shortly were, that one Packer had sold coals for the plaintiffs on commission, and that Sarah Tinson had entered into a guarantee for him to the extent of 300*l*. In this state of facts Packer became indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of 1272*l*., and the plaintiffs required that he should give further security. Whereupon the defendants were induced by Packer to give a guarantee to the plaintiffs, which they gave in entire ignorance of the fact, that Packer was already so largely indebted to the plaintiffs. Packer was subsequently dismissed, and the plaintiffs called upon the defendants for the amount guaranteed by them. The claim was resisted, on the ground that the plaintiffs had, at the time the defendants gave their guarantee, fraudulently concealed the fact that Packer was then largely in their debt.

The argument for the plaintiffs was based upon the decision in the case of The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd (10 Exch. 523), where it was held, that a creditor who takes a guarantee is not bound to disclose to the surety every fact within his own knowledge, which might affect the surety, or his willingness to enter into the contract, and that such non-communication will not, in the absence of actual fraud, affect the validity of the guarantee; and, therefore, that the plaintiffs were not bound to inform the defendants of their previous indebtedness of Packer; that the rule, that all material circumstances known to the insured must be communicated to the insurer, is peculiar to contracts of insurances, and does not extend to contracts of guarantee; and that it is for the surety to ask such questions as he thinks proper before he enters into the contract. Reliance being placed on the case of Railton v. Matthews (12 Cl. & Fin. 109), where Lord Campbell says, "Unless questions be particularly put by the surety to gain the information, I hold that it is quite unnecessary for the creditor to whom the suretyship is to be given, to make any such disclosure."

For the defendants it was argued, that the non-communication of the fact of Packer's indebtedness was a fraudulent concealment of a fact which it was material for the defendants to know. And the case of Railton v. Matthews (10 Cl. & Fin. 937) was relied upon, in which Lord Campbell held, "that the liability of a surety must depend upon the situation in which he is placed, upon the knowledge which is communicated to him of the facts of the case, and not upon that which was passing in the mind of the other party, or the motive of the other party."

The majority of the Court held, that there was evidence of a fraudulent concealment by the plaintiffs of the fact of Packer's indebtedness; and, therefore, that the defendants were entitled to retain the verdict which had been found for them. We should have stated, that the plaintiffs had no personal communication with the defendants on the subject of the guarantee, but sent it to him for execution by an agent, who had no authority from them to communicate, and did not communicate, Packer's condition. The agent brought the draft guarantee, the guarantee of Mrs. Tinson, and the original agreement between Packer and the plaintiffs, and told the defendants that their guarantee was to be supplemental to Mrs. Tinson's. The majority of the Court were of opinion that the plaintiffs would naturally infer from these documents, that Mrs. Tinson's guarantee, as well as their own, was applicable to new dealings, and not to wipe off the balance already due from Packer.

Now, the case before the Court might be distinguished from The North British Insurance Company v. Lloyd, on the ground, that in the latter there was only non-communication of a fact; whereas, in the former, the sending these documents to the defendants was a positive act of fraud; but the judgments do not clearly appear to rest on this distinction; and, in fact, according to the judgment of Blackburn, J., it will be extremely unsafe for any creditor, who requires a guarantee, not to make to the surety the fullest disclosure of the position of the debtor. He says, "I think it must in every case depend upon the nature of the transaction, whether the fact not disclosed is such that it is impliedly represented not to exist; and that must generally be a question of fact proper for a jury." There is, therefore, no settled rule of law on the point; in all cases it is for a jury to say whether or not a particular fact should have been communicated to the surety, and whether its suppression was such a concealment as to amount to moral fraud; and thus no creditor can be certain that his guarantee is sound, unless he has communicated everything which he knows about the debtor's circumstances.

The dissentient judges were of opinion that it is for the surety to ask questions, not for the creditor to volunteer information; but at present this is not the law.

We find in this, as in many other cases, judges differing entirely as to the inference to be drawn from facts, and in this particular case, not from a mass of complicated facts, but from very few. If men trained for many years to habits of reasoning, and accustomed to deal with facts, and to present them to be dealt with by juries, can thus differ, it is only to be expected that juries will be more likely to do so, and, therefore, that it is impossible to anticipate what conclusions they will draw from a given state of facts; whether they will consider the non-communication of a fact by a creditor was immaterial, or so important as to amount to fraudulent concealment.

The safest course, therefore, which, after the judgment in Lee v. Jones, a creditor can pursue when he requires a guarantee, is to exercise uberrimam fidem towards the surety, and in fact, although it is said that the rule which applies to policies of insurance does not apply to contracts of guarantee, still to act as if he were bound by that rule.

THE Queen's speech, as had been anticipated, promises no measure, the introduction of which is likely to cause a trial of party strength, or to shorten the last session of an expiring Parliament, and there would, therefore, appear to be time for the introduction of useful, social, and legal reforms.

In a recent article in this Journal it was suggested that Parliament might, in such a time of quietness, devote its attention to an amendment of the bankruptcy and patent laws, and of the procedure in the Divorce Court. But the speech does not hint at any change in the law of bankruptcy, although there is the common complaint of its defects, nor is a word said in it with reference to the Divorce Court. We can easily understand that there are great difficulties in dealing with the law of divorce, and, perhaps, there is not yet that amount of complaint with regard to it which forces a measure upon the attention of the Legislature; but, as to the Bankruptcy Act, there can be no doubt that great alterations are required, and it is matter of surprise that no notice should have been taken of it. We are glad, however, to see that Mr. Moffatt is taking the matter up, and we trust that his endeavours will be aided at least by the legal members of Parliament.

The Attorney-General's proposed measure for the erection of the new law courts is, no doubt, a very desirable proceeding, but there can be nothing in it which can occupy a session, or prevent the Government introducing other measures of legal reform. Unless it is a thing impossible to frame a sound and just law of bankruptcy, it is a discredit to the Legislature that the law should remain as it now is, carped at and abused by everybody who has to come in contact with it.

Since we wrote the above remarks, we find, from the reports of the proceedings in the House of Lords on Thursday evening, that Lord Westbury is at last sensible of some of the defects in his Bankruptcy Act, but he takes no notice of the numerous decisions in which trust deeds have been held invalid, and, in fact, appears to think that this part of the act has worked well. As, however, Mr. Moffatt seems also to be determined to act vigorously in the matter, it is to be hoped that something will be done this session to effect the amendments so urgently required,

PROBATE DUTY PAYABLE IN RESPECT OF LEASEHOLDS IN MORTGAGE.

THE following paper, which was read by Mr. H. Reynolds, solicitor, of Birmingham, at a meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, held there, has reference to questions of sufficient practical importance to justify us in placing it before our readers in extenso. We are informed, that where the point suggested by Mr. Reynolds is taken, the Inland Revenue Office give way; but that if no notice is taken, the office collect the revenue, to which, by their own act in other cases, they admit they have no right.

It is enacted by the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 38, that "the estate and effects of the deceased" shall be valued for the purposes of probate, "without deducting anything on account of the debts due and owing from the deceased;" and by the 51st section it is provided, that a return of probate duty shall be made in respect of debts, if paid and claimed within three years after the date of probate.

Since this enactment the practice has been, and is, to pay probate duty on the gross value of the personal estate and effects, without deducting anything in respect of debts owing. So where the estate, or a portion of the estate, consists of leaseholds subject to a mortgage, duty is paid in respect of the full value of the leaseholds, without deducting therefrom the amount of mortgage money, on the ground, that being a debt owing from the deceased, and as such "payable by law out of his or her personal or movable estate," no such deduction should be made. The practice in this case, I think, is wrong, and not borne out by the requirements of the statute; which provides, that the "estate and effects of the deceased" shall be valued, without deducting anything on account of debts. If the deceased had leaseholds in mortgage, his estate in such leaseholds would be a diminished estate, an equity of redemption, and as such should be valued. If I am right in this view, and I think I am, it is of importance to the public at large, that the practice be altered; as, irrespective of the loss arising from the payment of duty, the repayment of which cannot be claimed except within the time provided by the statute, we all know the great trouble and expense attending upon obtaining repayment, even in ordinary cases. Hence, it commonly happens, where the amount repayable is within 10%, no claim is made.

Without practical experience or consideration, it would not appear, that paying duty on the gross value is of any great practical moment, seeing that return of duty in respect of debts paid can be obtained within the three years; and in ordinary cases it is not of great moment, the only drawback being the professional trouble and expense attendant, which, however, are of some moment. But in the case put, i. e. where the estate, or portion of the estate, consists of leaseholds in mortgage, it is very different, and the extra amount of duty is frequently lost, as in numerous instances the mortgage money is not paid within the three years, and, therefore, no repayment obtained; and it unfortunately happens that these are the cases in which the loss of the money is most felt. Instance the following, which occurred in my own practice:—A. B. died in the year 1852, intestate, leaving a widow and children. The gross value of his estate was estimated, for purposes of administration, as being over 2000*l.* and under the value of 3000*l.* There were leaseholds, valued at about 2000*l.*, but in mortgage for 1700*l.*, so that the net value (i. e. the equity of redemption) was reduced to 300*l.*; and this, with the other portions of the estate (being under 150*l.*) made the total net value under 450*l.*, so that the figures controlling the payment of duty stood thus:—

Net value, under 450 l. . . .	11 0 0
Difference . . .	£64 0 0

Which, if paid, would have been lost, as the leaseholds could not be realised, nor mortgage money paid off within the three years.

This, comparatively, is an uncommon case, but a similar state of things is of frequent occurrence. And loss is of daily occurrence in ordinary cases, where claim for return of duty is not made within the three years. The following is illustrative:—

C. D. died in 1858, leaving a will. The gross value of his estate was estimated, for purposes of probate, as over 3000*l.* and under the value of 4000*l.* There were leaseholds valued at 2700*l.*, but in mortgage for 1300*l.*, leaving the net value, i. e. the equity of redemption, at 1400*l.*; and this, with the other portions of the estate, made the total value under 3000*l.*; so that the figures controlling the payment of duty stood thus:—

Gross value, under 4000 l. , duty . .	£60 0 0
Net value, under 3000 l. , duty . .	50 0 0
Difference	£10 0 0

In this case, if duty had been paid on the gross value, the difference would have been lost, as no payment was made so as to entitle to claim for repayment. It was not convenient to the parties interested to pay off the incumbrances, and the amounts repayable being but 10*l.*, a transfer of the security was not resorted to. Every solicitor in his own practice meets with many such cases.

In both of the above cases I paid the duty on the net values, and therefore no loss was sustained. I have adopted this mode of procedure for twelve or fifteen years past, without any official exception being taken, otherwise than as appears below, the residuary returns having been passed, and stamped in every case. No concealment was resorted to, the valuations having been so framed as to shew the value of the leaseholds unincumbered, the amount of the mortgage incumbrance deducted, and the balance stated as the value of the equity of redemption; and copies of these valuations were invariably forwarded to the commissioners, with the residuary returns. It will occur to every one considering the subject, whether an executor adopting this course is justified in deposing that the "estate and effects" are under the value of a certain sum, "without deducting anything on account of the debts of deceased." The "estate" only of the deceased is to be valued; and when an equity of redemption, or other reduced estate, the value of this estate can only be ascertained by getting at the value of the legal or other interest by which it is diminished. The other portions of the estate and effects may be liable to the incumbrance as debt; but if no deduction be made, I do not think that any conscientious or other objection attaches.

In the year 1858 exception was, for the first time, taken in a case which I then had before the commissioners, and Mr. Timm, the solicitor of Inland Revenue, wrote me, threatening exchequer process. I then wrote, and thus argued with Mr. Timm:—

"The residuary account of the personal estate of this deceased, supplied to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, was returned for amendment, with the following objection:—

"The gross value of the leaseholds should be brought into the account, and the mortgage deducted on page 2 of the account. The stamp on the letters of administration is insufficient to cover the gross amount of the personal effects."

"The 'estate and effects' of the deceased were properly valued for purposes of probate, 'without deducting anything on account of the debts due and owing from the deceased,' other than and except as shewn below. The bulk of the deceased's property consisted of leaseholds, the value of which, as estimated for purposes of probate, was 1963*l.*; but the deceased in his lifetime mortgaged for 1700*l.*, parting at such time with his legal interest, leaving him at the time of his decease possessed of but an equity of redemption; and the value of this interest was stated at 263*l.*, being the amount at which the property was valued, after deducting the amount of the mortgage incumbrance. The stat. 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 38, provides, that the 'estate and effects of the deceased' shall be valued for the purposes of probate, 'without deducting anything on account of the debts due and owing from the deceased;' and in this case, the 'estate and effects' were so valued. One portion of the estate being but an equitable interest (an equity or right of redemption), was taken at its value, ascertained by getting at its gross value, and then deducting the amount of incumbrance, and this mode of procedure would appear to be consistent with the statute, as much so as if the beneficial interest in the estate had been incumbered or affected by any legal estate or charge, and no debt created; the word used being the 'estate' of the deceased; and it would appear quite as consistent so to deal with an equity or right of redemption, as with a life or other estate less than that of absolute ownership; and there is nothing in the statute which leads to any other interpretation, or that the words 'without deducting,' &c., were intended to have any other than their ordinary signification. It may not, without explanation, be seen, that the above interpretation is of any importance in practice, seeing that, after payment of mortgage money, a return of probate duty may be obtained. In many cases it would be unimportant, but in the present case it is of moment; the property is mortgaged close to its full value, and the widow and administratrix being left with a very small income and large family, would find considerable difficulty in providing the extra amount of probate duty.

"I, during the last ten or twelve years, have in practice so treated leaseholds in mortgage, valuing only the equity of redemption as being the only estate in the deceased, and paying probate duty accordingly; and in no instance, excepting the present (and I have had many such cases), have the commissioners objected, having passed and stamped the accounts in every case. Finally, one vital reason why the statute should not be construed as repugnant is, that in many cases great personal wrong would be inflicted; instance the present case:—A widow left with a large family, the only assets, independent of household furniture, being a leasehold property, mortgaged close to its market value, the widow and children being dependent for a subsistence upon the surplus income. Now, the only way in this case by which the debt owing to the mortgagee can be satisfied, so as to give right to return of probate duty, under the 51st section of the statute, is to obtain a new mortgage; and failing this, to sell the property, which would, doubtless, be a necessity, as it would be next to an impossibility to procure the mortgage money from a third party, the security not being ample; so that the widow must either lose a considerable sum in payment of probate duty, which ought to be repaid, but cannot be obtained, or, in obtaining it, be deprived of the scanty subsistence of herself and children."

After the above, Mr. Timm did not further object, and the papers were duly passed and stamped; and I have continued the practice, as above explained, now for a period of about fifteen years, without any successful objection being made. A similar objection was made by the authorities, in a case I had before them in the year 1859, but, after my representations, this was waived.

At the outset, supposing that some of my professional friends may have taken a similar view and acted upon it, I made inquiries, but found that such was not the case, and I consequently proceeded independently.

The question being one calculated to affect the revenue to a serious extent, I did not anticipate, if I succeeded, that I should do so without considerable opposition, and was, therefore, surprised that I was allowed to proceed unquestioned for so long a time—ten years or upwards; and when objection was made, as explained, i. e. in 1858, I anticipated some action would be taken on the subject, and I purposed, in such case, bringing the question before the Birmingham Law Society; feeling it to be a matter of too much moment to be allowed to pass without the best consideration being given to it. However, as you have seen, the point was conceded without further question.

PATENTS.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—Feb. 13, 1865.—Lord Stanley, M.P., in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. Edward Webster on the subject of "Capital Punishment in cases of Murder," contending that penal servitude for life, irremissible except on the convict saving life, and pardonable only on the establishment of his innocence, should be substituted. He considered the question before the Royal Commission not exclusively one of policy, but one also involving considerations of great social importance affecting civilisation, and that the theological arguments had been abandoned, at least, by the House of Commons. As moral retributions, executions, he said, were valueless, and that, even if the number and atrocity of murders remained the same, a secondary punishment would occasion much good by its certainty, and especially by avoiding the possibility of an innocent person dying on the scaffold. The crime of murder, he said, was one "sui generis," presenting an uniform origin, though varying in species, and was of a nature which prevented the fear of the executioner. Most murders were impulsive, and nearly allied to insanity. He referred to other countries in which the capital penalty had been abrogated for several years and not re-established; and concluded, by alleging that, under a secondary punishment, murder and its kindred offences would be less frequent, because the community would be more humane. The lecture appeared to give much satisfaction. Mr. W. M. Beat, Mr. Worsley, Mr. Dudley Campbell, Mr. Macqueen, Q.C., Mr. Tallack (Secretary to the Ante Capital Punishment Association), addressed the meeting. The chairman, alluding to the fact of his being on a Royal Commission engaged in considering this question, abstained from expressing any opinion on the subject generally, beyond admitting the evils of public executions; and he then summed up the arguments of the speakers with his usual ability.

COUNTY COURTS EXTENSION.—At a sitting of the Brompton County Court, Sir J. E. E. Wilmot, Bart., the presiding judge, who is also judge of the Marylebone and Brentford County Courts, made some observations upon the subject of the measure contemplated by Government, as announced in her Majesty's speech, for conferring an equity jurisdiction upon the county courts. He said he had heard that announcement with very great satisfaction, as he had, during the many years he had held the office of county court judge, been always strongly of opinion that the existing tribunals in equity, for various reasons, which he enumerated, afforded no means of obtaining justice to the poorer classes of the community. He then pointed out the necessity of reconstructing and reorganising existing courts, and constructing additional ones, illustrating his remarks by references to his own experience in the district. He then went on to say, that there were other questions connected with the proposed Government measure which ought not to be lost sight of. The power of committal exercised by the judges was susceptible of improvement and modification; and what was now accomplished to mitigate the carrying out of commitments was by the plaintiff's consenting to allow the commitment to hang over the head of the debtor, in the event of the non-payment of the instalments, might be placed in the power of the judge by legal enactment. He thought, too, the time was come when the common-law jurisdiction of the county courts might be further extended and enlarged; and what had been often recommended by Lord Brougham might most usefully be introduced, namely, to allow plaintiffs in all cases whatever to initiate their actions in the county courts, leaving it open to the defendants in certain cases, and in those exceeding a certain amount in value, to remove them to a superior court. He felt sure that the result would be, that when cases were once there they would be seldom removed. At present, as they were aware, the law was, that all cases could be tried in the county courts with mutual consent. But as the consent of one or the other party was indispensable, it was always withheld, and consequently that provision was altogether useless. There were other subjects which might be made the subject of the serious consideration of the Legislature, and which he trusted would not be lost sight of in the bill to be presented to Parliament. He looked for a comprehensive and statesmanlike measure, and not one which would require supplemental legislation in a future session. Mr. Clarke, sen., practising attorney at the Marylebone and Brompton County Courts, spoke on behalf of his professional brethren, and indorsed all what had been stated by the judge.

THE BANKRUPTCY OF MORRIS LEVI, OF BIRMINGHAM.—Yesterday, at the Birmingham Bankruptcy Court, judgment was given by Mr. Commissioner Sanders, on a petition for the annulment of the bankruptcy of Morris Levi, of Birmingham, whose extraordinary failure some months ago, under the peculiar circumstances attending it, excited surprise throughout the commercial world. The petition mainly arose out of the criminal proceedings instituted against Levi at the instance of the Commissioner in Bankruptcy. The bankrupt was charged before the magistrates (under the fraudulent bankruptcy sections of the Bankruptcy Act) with obtaining large quantities of goods without the prospect or intention of paying for them; and the investigation had advanced two days, when Mr. John Smith, who appeared for the bankrupt, took exception to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, on the ground that the accused was not a bankrupt. The basis of this plea was the fact that the original petitioning creditor, John Painter, withdrew from the petition, and that other creditors, without taking out a fresh petition, as Mr. Smith contended that they were bound by the act to do, proceeded and obtained an adjudication upon Painter's petition. He urged that Levi's bankruptcy was barred by a deed of assignment, to which the petitioning creditors (Carpenter and others, of Manchester) were consenting parties, and under which they had taken a benefit. Upon Mr. Smith stating that a petition would be presented to the Bankruptcy Court, praying for the annulment of the bankruptcy on these grounds, the magistrates adjourned the hearing of the case, and admitted the prisoner to bail in 2000*l.*, pending the decision of the commissioner. This decision was given yesterday. The commissioner held that there had been a valid bankruptcy, and dismissed the petition with costs against the petitioner. He refused to believe the evidence given in support of the prayer for annulment, and characterised the whole proceeding as a manoeuvre and a contrivance resorted to for the purpose of impeding the course of justice. The decision will be appealed against.—Leeds Mercury.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—The bill for the Concentration of the Courts of Justice provides, that in making up by fees from the suitors (other than those of the Court of Chancery) the residue or deficiency in the funds provided for the new building, the mode of payment is to be a redemption annuity of 4*l.* per cent. on the sum to be thus made up, which annuity is to be paid for a term not exceeding fifty years. The suitors (other than those of Chancery) are to contribute in proportion, as far as may be, to the extent of the use made by them of the building. The contribution is to be levied by a separate fee, called "the rent of courts fee," to be collected by stamps. The bill provides, that causes at present tried at Guildhall and at Westminster are to be tried in the new building.

THE LAWS AFFECTING RAILWAYS, BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME.

SIR W. HODGESS'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.

"The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

A MANUAL of EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE,
founded on the Works of Story, Spence, and other Writers, and on the subsequent Cases: comprising the Fundamental Principles, and the Points of Equity usually occurring in General Practice. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L., Q. C. SEVENTH EDITION. 1864.

"Mr. Josiah Smith may claim the praise of reviving a compendious form of legal literature which was adopted by the best legal writers of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. . . . The success of the book may be found in the answer to the question, What would the student do without some such short treatise? . . . In the present, the whole scope of equity is brought into view in a clear and just relation between its parts, on a reduced scale. The result is admirably small in bulk; but the Author's labour necessary for such a result, even after his advantages of discipline as Editor of Fearn and Miford, was far from small. . . . But there is another class of learners; for a lawyer is a learner all his life. . . . They can at once put their hand on a principle, exact in its definition, and well ordered as to its place, in the Manual. . . . To sum up all in one word, for the student and the jurist, the Manual is the nearest approach to an equity code that the present literature of the law is able to furnish."—Law Times, Jan. 16, 1864.

"It will be found as useful to the practitioner as to the student."—Solicitors' Journal, Jan. 3, 1864.

"Mr. Smith's Manual has fairly won for itself the position of a standard work. Its great utility to the student has long been acknowledged; and the present edition has been made peculiarly valuable to practitioners."—Jurist, Jan. 30, 1864.

"It is almost impossible to over-rate the value of Mr. Smith's Manual."—Leguleian, Hil. Term, 1864.

"There is no disguising the truth; the proper mode to use this book is to learn its pages by heart; that is to say, such a familiarity should be sought with each paragraph as to render it a part of those possessions of the mind which form portions, as it were, of the mind itself, or rather of that apparatus which the mind unconsciously uses in framing its judgment on each subject. . . . In conclusion, we must express our satisfaction that Mr. Smith has, by his literary labours, and especially by his share in framing the Consolidated Orders, earned for himself a distinction coveted by the most eminent advocate."—Law Magazine and Review, May, 1861.

STARKIE'S LAW OF EVIDENCE.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of EVIDENCE. By THOMAS STARKIE, Esq. Fourth Edition, with very considerable alterations and additions; incorporating the Statutes and reported Cases to the time of publication. By G. M. DOWDESWELL and J. G. MALCOLM, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. In 1 vol. royal 8vo., 1855, price 1*l.* 16*s.* cloth.

In the parliamentary debate on disqualified witnesses (House of Commons, Feb. 12, 1861), referring to the case of Maden v. Catnach, Sir G. C. Lewis said, "He would read from Starkie on Evidence, which was known to be a standard work upon the subject, a statement of the law as applicable to the case (vide Examination as to Religious Belief, pp. 115, 116). That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

The EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

The PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

The Policies of this Society, in the hands of third parties, are not vitiated by Suicide, or by the Life assured proceeding beyond the limits allowed.

NOTICES of ASSIGNMENT of Policies registered and acknowledged free of charge. Printed Forms for such Notices furnished when required.

The usual Commission allowed to Solicitors introducing Insurances, the Commission being continued to the person originally entitled to it as long as the Policy remains in force, through whatever channel the Premium may be paid.

LOANS granted on the Society's Policies, on Reversions, Life Interests, and other approved Security.

The Annual Reports and full Statements of Account are regularly printed, and may be obtained on application.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 25, 1865.

UPWARDS of 20,000*l.* were expended by the late Statute-law Commission in an abortive attempt to compete with "Chitty's Statutes." The only further advance towards a code or a digest, of which formal notice has been given, is a little more repealing of repealed acts; but there is reason to fear that the sense of that obligation to be always reforming the law which is supposed to bind every occupant of the woolsack, will shortly urge the present Lord Chancellor or his successor to a still more expensive and equally abortive competition with Harrison's and Chitty's Digests. We say abortive, because, though a digest is one of the most pressing wants of the profession, there is no general agreement as to the proper function, form, and authority of a digest; or if there be an agreement among those whose utterances on the subject have been chiefly listened to, we believe that it is not shared by that large majority of sound and judicious lawyers who have no time or inclination for disputation. A digest prepared otherwise than upon a complete and exhaustive plan, and with the intention from the commencement of superseding every other record of precedents, would be worthless.

The merit of the address of Sir James Wilde at York lies rather in the clear and easy exposition of the growth and present state of the law, than in any suggestions for amendment; and a friendly examination of that address, and of some recent comments upon it, will enable us to point out what we conceive to be incomplete or erroneous in the prevailing views on the subject of a digest of the law.

After referring to the amendments in procedure which were originated by Lord Brougham, Sir J. Wilde proceeded to notice the defects in the form of the law itself:—"To what extent," said he, "can the common law of this country lay claim to simplicity, certainty, clearness, and unerring justice? Above all, what can we say of its compactness, whose principles wander at large through the pages of 300 volumes [the number exceeds 1100], and the leaves of whose oracles lie as they fall, scattered and unsown?" Then, digressing for a time from form to substance, he made some remarks on the inevitable insufficiency for modern wants of laws which have suffered no general revision from time immemorial, and have been built up mainly by judicial labour upon foundations laid before the time of the Plantagenets:—

"A few further reflections may tend to shew with what inevitable defects. In saying this, I am far from the suggestion or belief that this gradual progress of the law, built upon old foundations, resting step by step on precedents reaching far back into remote antiquity, and thus bringing up to the surface the experience and wisdom of past generations, was altogether faulty in system, or void of invaluable features. It had, however, this capital defect, that the powers of the courts of law were constructive only; under the name of adaption they could practically create; under no name could they destroy. But it was not enough to create, power was needed to abolish; it was not enough to build, unless timely clearance could be made of the ruins and rubbish of past structures. Here it is that, in my opinion, the system has broken down. This defect it was that choked the accesses of justice with empty forms and worn-out expedients, and induced those vices of procedure which the labours of the law reformers of the last thirty years have scarce sufficed to remove. . . . Let us examine our English system of law making a little closer, and observe the inevitable process. Did a new position arise for which the jurist had no precedent, analogy was resorted to. If no near analogy was at hand, a more distant one was sought; if none found in the region of similar rights, a more remote one, taken from a different class or branch was often brought forward, and bent, perhaps distorted, till it served the end. It might, perhaps, have been better to deal with a new class of cases as avowedly demanding an application of law, for which there was no precedent; and this has been sometimes, though more rarely, done. But it must be borne in mind that the Courts at Westminster had in strictness no power to make the law, but only to declare it. They had no alternative, therefore, between declaring the voice of the law to be absolutely silent, and adapting its recorded oracles, such as they were, to the case in hand as best they might."

If this be a remediable defect in the organisation of English law, the lecturer has not hinted at the remedy. Indeed, he proceeds to point out the advantages of the method:—

"It is no small benefit that, in a fresh application of legal principles to a new class of cases, there should be apparently mingled the element and the sanction of time. The decisions of the Courts, being avowedly nothing more than enunciations of pre-existing law, though in reality new determinations framed upon old principles, carry with them the veneration of tradition, while they embody the spirit of the time. It is another circumstance of value that the changes effected are gradual, and while they do not anticipate yet keep pace with the necessities of the day. Further, when any new subject engages the attention of the Courts, it is the peculiar feature of this system, that each step is taken separately, never exceeding the particular circumstances of the case or aiming at generalities. Thus the law falls into shape as the subject becomes familiar; opportunity is given by the succession of each fresh example for contrast and reconsideration; the direction first taken is followed out, modified, or even reversed; limitations and qualifications make their appearance; and something like a general rule at length emerges, well suited to the actual exigencies from the experience of which it is drawn. If this is legislation, it is legislation of the best kind, for it is framed by those who have no popular interests to support or collateral ends to attain, and who bring to the task carefully-trained intellects familiar with the subject in hand."

But there is a set-off against these advantages:—

parent. Invested with a power larger than avowed, the tribunals may be said to have too much or too little confided to them. If they frame new applications of the law they are obliged to do so on old models only, and administer them under old forms. Tied down by the past, they are too little set at large to work out entire justice. Working in the trammels of tradition, they are driven to the resort of legal fictions. Founding all decision on precedent, they are circumscribed and limited by the analogies on which their decisions are founded. The broad rule of right is too apt to suffer in such circumstances; and full justice must needs be at times shorn down to obtain a footing on precedent. But the worst feature attending a law purely traditional is its incapacity to obliterate. Tradition is the expression of permanence; and if it perpetuates truth it also embalms error. It renders what is really obsolete unquestioned because it is familiar, and fences it from attack by giving it the immunity of age."

It is obvious that the defects here pointed out are inseparable from the system. Indeed, they are stated rather as a priori deductions from the data than as the result of experience. A judicature bound by precedent cannot do much towards the correction of precedent. That is the function of the Legislature; and the facility of legislative correction which a digest would afford does not appear to have been hitherto pointed out. When a rule of the common law is found to be inconvenient or anomalous, the safest mode of getting rid of it is simply to enact, that the precedents which involve the rule shall no longer be binding. The construction of a new rule is then left to the judicature; and the course they will take may be anticipated with certainty from the tendency of their previous comments on the rejected precedents. But to object to laws founded on precedent, that "tradition is the expression of permanence," and that "if it perpetuates truth it also embalms error," is to talk without aim, or to object to all law, for that only is law which is fixed. The synonym of an act of Parliament is a word expressive of permanence. Accordingly the lecturer proceeds to point out that codes, no less than precedents, fail to provide effectually for the future:—

"Does any code really offer a text which, when applied to the circumstances of an individual case, at once, and without reasonable doubt, decides it? Let the innumerable decisions on some of the most celebrated codes answer the question. Take the Ordonnance de la Marine of Louis XIV. How simple and brief, and apparently plain, the text! Yet who ever read the ingenious commentaries of Valin or Boulay-Paty on any and every article of it without owning that the text was only plain because the difficulties of particular cases were not present to view, and only simple because their complications were excluded? The same thing is true of the codes of the French empire, and of all others which the world ever saw. The truth is, that the intricacies and complexity of possible combinations of fact are beyond the range of human conception, and any attempt to foresee and provide for them all beforehand, and dispense a ready-made justice with success, will give little reward to the labour it wastes. But a code resting on no detailed decisions or elaborate instances to expound it has an especial evil of its own. There is no more fruitful source of doubt and litigation than the meaning of language. The careless use of language does much, but the inadequacy of language, as the vehicle of precise thought, does, perhaps, even more. What treaty, or code, or statute was ever so framed that its meaning in all possible contingencies was free from reasonable controversy? Now, the especial evil of all codes and statutes is, that over and above the difficulty of framing adequate principles, the ambiguities of construction are introduced. Expressed in certain definite language, its force depends upon the interpretation which ingenuity may give or deny it. And here the system of case law contrasts favourably, for its principles, enforced in every variety of language and under every turn of thought, shine out in their application rather than in their expression, and are further removed from the cavil of words."

This is a concise and clear expression of the grounds on which every thoughtful lawyer rests his preference of precedent law to statute law—the necessary certainty and completeness of exposition in a well-reported precedent; the inevitable uncertainty and incompleteness of the most carefully-framed enactment. But now the lecturer shifts his ground, and takes up a less tenable position:—

"We have nothing in the English law between the succinctness of a maxim and the detail of an individual case. We have no declared body of rules, however general, and no set of collected principles, however broad. There are, no doubt, to be found scattered up and down our reports, enunciations of general legal principles; but even they have never been collated or brought together, and their mutual dependence shewn by group or contrast. But, in far the majority of cases decided, no general principle is propounded. The principle is, indeed, there, guiding and controlling the decision; a silent appeal is made to it in the mind of the tribunal; but such is the jealous caution of the judicial mind, and so great the obstacles cast in the way of generalities by a system which calls only for the decision of the individual case, that broad rules are seldom or never laid down. Hence it comes, that the cases containing the law on one particular branch or subject are rarely appealed to in discussion of another branch or subject, though these may be cognate, and though the law ought to be, and probably is, in harmony with respect to them. No subject can be treated philosophically that is treated entirely in detail, and no system can promise harmony that is based on separate trains of independent thought. Is it not possible to amend our legal system in this regard? If it be considered not wise, that the tribunal should do more than decide the individual case, and pledge itself, as it were, to an area of law wider than that occupied by the matter in hand, and this to preclude the possibility of prejudging difficulties not foreseen; still, the law as already settled, and to the extent to which it has already been actually applied, might surely be bound together and epitomized."

mised for the practical use of mankind. Is not this what, in fact and in practice, every well-read lawyer more or less does for himself? When a case presents itself to his mind for legal solution, does he instantly recur to some specific case forming a precedent, or does he not rather fall back upon the general legal principles with which his mind is imbued? Now, I hope I am not too sanguine in this; but I cannot resist the belief, that within the bounds of reasonable labour and time, the general principles and broad bases, on which our common law reposes, and which tacitly guide the decisions of our Courts, might be brought to the surface, grouped together, subordinated in their several relations, and contrasted in their differences. An attempt of the kind, and not without great success, was made by the late Mr. Smith in his Leading Cases. . . . What I desire to see is a similar attempt made with authority, and on a much larger scale, to be finally confirmed by act of Parliament; but I do not conceal from myself, that the first judicial minds of the country are alone adequate to the task; at least, in its ultimate stages; and that it is far beyond the reach of the unpaid services of occupied men. If such a result could be obtained, the benefits are not doubtful: to the student and the general public the vast area covered by the law would present a district set out in order, in place of a tangled thicket. The true bearing of each abstract proposition would stand out plainly, because side by side with others of a similar nature. Here, too, another great advantage would be reaped. As the decisions which have radiated from some central case came to be classed together, and their common principles, with its qualifications and limitations extracted, all those of a questionable soundness would come to be suppressed. . . . But the great gain that would accrue to the law would be the reduction of its bulk. We possess in our legal records accumulated instances of exact justice, in individual cases, series after series of social duties and relative rights, set forth in every variety and combination, and pursued into the minutest details, and to all of which, each in their turn, the law has been applied and adjusted with a precision and laborious rectitude such as the legal annals of no other country can, I believe, produce. The national attribute of exact labour on minute objects has stood us in good stead in the beating out of our laws. . . . But they exist in a scattered, inconvenient, and unmanageable form. Instances in place of precepts, examples in the place of rules, our recorded decisions stand thick together like a fair field of grain—full of wealth and worth, but waiting the hand that shall gather it into sheaves and store it to the use of man. And here I would observe, that the method I propose is properly a digest and not a code; and a digest has this advantage, that it permits of gradual formation. Unlike a code, which is the offspring of large and comprehensive views—and should deal with all subjects as a whole—a digest, with narrower aim, may properly be worked out piecemeal. . . . If there be those who fear to handle a body of laws which, on the whole, work so well, I would observe to them that I propose to displace nothing. I would not that the authority of the cases should necessarily be extinguished by the authority of the digest. Unless expressly set aside, and [as?] inconsistent with other decisions better approved, I would have all decisions remain of authority, content to await the time when the life shall have passed into their offspring, and they fall away of themselves, and pass into a sure decay."

Bating the attribute of authority, we have all that is here asked for in our treatises. A revision of the cases, and an authoritative repeal of such as are deemed to be erroneous, must form part of every scheme for digesting the law. But to substitute "precepts in place of instances—rules in the place of examples"—would be to exchange the peculiar advantages of law in the form of precedent, which have been so well indicated, for the peculiar disadvantages of codified law. Codes—at least such as are framed by practical men—are the fruit of experience, not of speculation. The French codes consist of precepts and rules, not spun from the brains of their framers, but drawn from the precedents and traditions of the ancient law. Large portions of the codes consist of almost literal extracts from the treatises of French lawyers, which have lost all their flexibility and value by the process. Beyond the elimination to a certain extent of conflicting authorities (which is the least of the benefits to be expected from a digest), Sir J. Wilde's plan offers no remedy for, but rather an aggravation of, the existing evils. For his digest of "principles and rules" would not be a digest, but a code. Promulgated by authority, it could not be neglected. And as the existing precedents, or the greater part of them, would retain all their authority, we should have no alleviation of the bulk and chaotic confusion of the law, but to the labour of collating our 1100 or 1200 volumes of cases with each other would be added the labour of collating them with the principles and rules of the digest, and of criticising the whole. In fact, the state of things would be such as might flow from enacting that all the standard treatises, as well as the reports, should be binding authorities.

Mr. Reilly, in his "Observations on a Digest of Law" (a reprint of which will be found ante, p. 30), appears to understand as we have done, that Sir J. Wilde means by a digest a collection of precepts or rules, and not a collection of examples or precedents; and he seems to distinguish a digest from a code merely by the absence of authority. "A code is the work of legislative authority; a digest is not, or need not, be more than a systematic classification of law. . . . A code makes the law, a digest merely states it." But if the statement is authoritative, it is a code. This use of the term is not justified either by ancient or by modern usage, nor by convenience. Until the delivery of the address at York a digest was understood to mean a concise statement and orderly arrangement of precedents.

Mr. Reilly proposes that the digest should be prepared under the direction of a committee of the Privy Council, should include the statute law, and should be in the form of propositions, with references to authorities, and should not be enacted. "The digest should,

I submit, be left to rest for such acceptance as it would require at first merely on its intrinsic merits, and on the fact of its compilation by efficient authority. For greater solemnity, it might be promulgated by proclamation from the Queen in Council. . . . Once issued, it would soon establish itself."

This would be merely to create a board for editing treatises on law at the expense of the country. We think they would not be so well done as they are done under the voluntary system, and the great evil—the 1100 volumes of authorities—would be untouched.

In a well-written article in the last part of the Law Magazine, intitled "The Preservation of English Law," this system of writing up the law at the public expense, without giving authority to the result, is recommended. We have no confidence in such a scheme. In the business of compiling unauthoritative treatises, neither the duty of appointing the best men, nor that of performing the work in the best manner, would be discharged under the sense of any great responsibility, and the scheme would probably end in an expensive job, or if success were achieved, it would not be very important.

What is wanted is an abridgment of the reports, omitting all superfluous and obsolete matter, and all erroneous decisions, and retaining all that is worth preserving, still in the form of reports, the whole being arranged methodically. The selection of men to collate, expurgate, abridge, and arrange all the precedents of the law, with a view to the putting of their work in the place of the existing authorities, and the performance of such a task, would be done under a sense of heavy responsibility, and the probability of success would be commensurate with the importance of the anticipated result.

If the distinctions between equity and law and between courts of equity and courts of law ought to be wholly abolished, and if the decision of actions involving claims of small amount is properly entrusted to the county courts, it seems an easy and safe step to infer that equitable jurisdiction in small matters ought to also be given to the same courts. The inference, however, would not be logically sound, even from those premises; for it may well be that the constitution of the superior courts fits them for an equitable jurisdiction, while the inferior courts are unfitted for it. There is great reason, however, for doubting the soundness of the premises, and believing that nearly the whole of the administrative functions of courts of equity, and some portions of their remedial functions, are better discharged under the present arrangement than they would be if committed to the ordinary courts of law.

The Lord Chancellor's speech on introducing his bill was not very clear, and the bill itself is not yet accessible; so that we cannot even guess how the great problem of ascertaining the limits of the jurisdiction is solved; but it appears to be intended that the county courts should, among other things, have authority to entertain administration suits and suits between partners. Now, while conceding that it may be well to excuse the superior judges from looking into the retail accounts of bakers and tallymen, we think it is very obvious that the county courts are ill fitted for the administration of assets, and the performance of the trusts of wills, which often run through two or three generations, and that, at least so long as the differences between law and equity, and between common-law lawyers and equity lawyers, exist, it would introduce the greatest confusion and uncertainty to entrust the decision of equitable rights to the common-law lawyers who are the judges of the county courts.

Some amendment of the procedure in Chancery in small matters is undoubtedly necessary, and it might be well to provide in such cases for the decision by the chief clerk of many matters that must now be brought into court; and it might also be well to increase the number of clerks. The inconvenience and expense involved in the necessity of sending all cases (out of the county palatine) to London, have been much exaggerated, but doubtless there would be great advantage in establishing a branch office of the Court of Chancery in each of the principal towns, where much of the business now transacted in chambers might be got through. This, with a more liberal use of the post-office, would give all the facilities that could possibly be derived from local courts, without sacrificing the great benefit of uniformity of practice, and the general supervision of judges and officers of the highest class. In ordinary plaints for debt, the debtor and creditor usually reside in the same district, but in those matters which come within the administrative action of the Court of Chancery, the persons interested are frequently scattered over the country, and the forum for adjusting their rights could not be placed more conveniently than in London.

PROBATE DUTY PAYABLE IN RESPECT OF LEASEHOLDS IN MORTGAGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—The construction of the 38th section of the 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, in Mr. Reynolds's paper on the payment of probate duty, published in your last number, involves a point connected with the title to leaseholds, in respect to which, if incorrect, it may create a serious objection in cases where the value of the leasehold exceeds the amount covered by the duty. Therefore, it should be well considered before it is generally adopted.

When an unincumbered leasehold estate is sold by an executor or administrator, the purchaser may, I apprehend, insist on having the probate or letters of administration stamped, so as to cover his purchase money. But here the estate is incumbered. Suppose it to be worth 1500*l.*, mortgaged for 1000*l.*, the other personal estate under 100*l.*, and the value of the whole sworn under 600*l.*, and the probate or letters of administration stamped accordingly. The leasehold is sold for 1500*l.* If Mr. Reynolds's construction is right, the purchaser cannot require any other stamp; if wrong, the purchaser's title will be defective without it.

The question depends on the meaning of the word "estate" in the act, which Mr. Reynolds interprets as if the mortgagor had absolutely disposed of a portion of his interest equivalent to the sum borrowed, or had charged it absolutely with the payment of such a sum; whereas he has only pledged it by way of security. His construction is opposed to all received notions of the respective interests of the mortgagor and mortgagee. If the mortgagor's estate is only what remains after deducting the amount of the mortgage, the rest must be the estate of the mortgagee, and would have to be valued as such in case of his death. But we know it is not so accounted; the debt constitutes part of the mortgagee's estate, and it follows, that the leasehold forms part of the "estate" of the mortgagor. He makes no distinction between the case of a mortgagor and that of a purchaser of an equity of redemption, although when we apply the direction that the debts of the deceased are not to be deducted, they are seen to be essentially different. Suppose the executor pays the debt out of the general assets, will not the whole leasehold estate, its full value, be part of the estate of the deceased? Has the payment of the debt worked any alteration in the nature of his interest? Suppose a testator gives leaseholds which have been mortgaged by him to A., freed from the mortgage, and leaves other assets sufficient to pay his mortgage and other debts, A. will take the leaseholds clear. He will have their value without any deduction, but he can take no more than the testator has to give. Then is it not incorrect to say, the "estate" of the deceased is the equity of redemption, and nothing more?

But to get at what is intended, "estate" must be read in connexion with the words, "without deducting anything on account of the debts due and owing from the deceased." They are used in relation to each other. Now, the construction ignores the fact, that the mortgage debt is as much a debt due from the deceased as any other; and that, while the act expressly says the debts are not to be deducted, it makes no distinction between mortgage and other debts. If a man dies possessed of a legal estate, charged with money he has borrowed to its full value, can it be said that he leaves no estate and no debts? In making up his residuary account, if the executor sells the leaseholds, and pays the mortgage debt out of the purchase moneys, will he not enter the whole of the purchase moneys among his receipts, and the debt among his payments?

The acquiescence of the stamp authorities is of no value in the argument. Having received all they were entitled to retain, to have required the full duty to be paid would have been causing useless trouble and expense to all parties.

In conclusion, I will add a case which lately occurred in practice. An agreement for the grant of building leases was assigned by the grantee as security for advances, which in the end exceeded the value. He died insolvent. His executors renounced, and, to enable the mortgagee to make a title, the widow took out letters of administration, the effects being sworn under 100*l*. The mortgagee then sold the benefit of the agreement for much more than 100*l*.; and, for a nominal consideration, the testatrix joined in the assignment. On a resale, the purchaser objected to the stamp on the letters of administration, and the vendor, after some discussion, thought fit to rescind the contract.

Lincoln's Inn, Feb. 21.

S. S. W.

[With great deference to our learned correspondent, we think that the construction adopted by Mr. Reynolds is right. The value of the deceased's estate collectively, and of each item of the estate individually, is what it will fetch if sold. If the estate, or any part of it, is subject to a charge, its value is diminished by the amount of the charge. Debts do not as such constitute a charge, and do not affect the estate in the hands of a purchaser from the executor or administrator. When a leasehold estate, charged with a mortgage debt, is valued as an equity of redemption only, the deduction is made, not for a debt, but for a charge. It is not the less a charge because it is also a debt. The Stamp Act does not say that no deduction is to be made for charges. The testator's estate in the mortgaged leasehold property, to follow out our correspondent's reasoning, is the absolute title to the enjoyment of the property during a term of years, or rather is the shadow of that title, the real title at law being in the mortgagee. But the beneficial title is subject to certain charges—an annual rent and a mortgage—both debts, but not the less charges. In valuing the estate, is no allowance to be made for the rent because it is a debt, secured by covenant?

Suppose that the testator is entitled to two leasehold houses—one derived under his father's marriage settlement, and charged to half its value with a portion for his sister; the other mortgaged by himself for half its value. It is conceded that in the one case the value of the estate, after deducting the charge, is the value on which duty is to be paid. Why should the rule be different in the other case? In either case it is equally optional with the executor whether the charge shall be paid out of the property charged or out of the general assets. And this conclusion is in accordance with the policy of the rule against deducting debts in the first instance—a rule intended to prevent evasions, which are impossible with respect to actual charges on property.

If our correspondent's construction is right, it may frequently happen that no return of probate duty can be claimed, although the whole of the assets may have been applied in satisfaction of debts and duty. Let the entire personal estate consist of the equity of redemption of a leasehold mortgaged for 1000*l*., the exact value of the property, and other assets, only sufficient to discharge the probate duty. If the executor is so unwise as to prove the will, and then allows the mortgagee to foreclose or realise his security, how can he obtain a return of the duty? The only return of duty allowed in respect of debts is on such debts as "the executor or administrator hath paid."

Moreover, the argument of our correspondent proceeds upon the false assumption, that the estate of the mortgagor in the mortgaged property is the estate which was created by the lease. It is no such thing either at law or in equity. At law the mortgagor has no estate at all; he is a perfect stranger to the property. In equity he has nothing more than the right to redeem the property on payment of the amount secured upon it. The value of that right in the market is the value of his equitable estate or interest in the leasehold property. If, after the mortgagor's death, his executor pays the mortgage debt out of the general assets, he changes the condition of the mortgaged estate, just as he might do if the incumbrances were only a charge, and not a debt of his testator. But the probate duty is determined by the condition of the estate at the death.]

An Essay upon Composition Deeds and other Deeds of Arrangement with Creditors, under the Stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134. By THOMAS ERSKINE HOLLAND, M.A., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. 12mo., pp. 207.

[Sweet.]

MR. HOLLAND, in his Preface to this very complete and useful treatise, expresses an opinion, that the uncertainties which obscured the subject have been, by the process of litigation, to a great extent dispelled. No doubt, a great many questions on the arrangement clauses have been settled; but as the clauses were unintelligible, and the questions raised upon them were innumerable, that does not represent a very satisfactory result. Not a step can be taken in applying the law by any light shed by the clauses themselves. It is not in them, but in the decisions by which they have been partly beaten into shape, that the law is to be sought; and these are so numerous, and often so inconsistent, that in carefully arranging, collating, and stating them, Mr. Holland has rendered an essential service to those who have to prepare or to advise on the operation of such deeds. The first four chapters are devoted to the subjects of compensation generally, composition by agreement under seal (with the rules as to accord and satisfaction), arrangement by deed, and the earlier statutes. The clauses of the act of 1861 are then set forth, with a thick fringe of annotations, expounding the construction which the Courts have fastened upon the ambiguous and contradictory sentences. Having thus produced the clauses in as presentable a form as possible, the author sets forth the General Orders, and then proceeds to consider the subject systematically, under the following heads:—Cessio bonorum—Conditions that the deed must extend to all creditors, and be for their equal benefit, and that the provisions must be reasonable—The use to be made of the certificate of registration—The deed must not be fraudulent—Cure of faults of the deed by the act. The concluding chapters are devoted to a summary of the law; notes on pleas and deeds, and anticipations of or suggestions for future legislation.

A Treatise on the Law of Railways, Railway Companies, and Railway Investments; with an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. By SIR W. HODGES, Knt., Chief Justice of Her Majesty's Supreme Court, Cape of Good Hope. Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. Royal 8vo., pp. 1006. [Sweet.]

A LENGTHENED notice of so well-known and well-established a work as Hodges on Railways, would be superfluous; but some acknowledgment is due to Mr. Smith for his judicious and conscientious labour in preparing the third and fourth editions of the book, and incorporating in them the results of the ten years of legislation and litigation which have elapsed since the publication of the last edition by the author. The following summary of the contents of the work will shew the great variety and importance of the subjects comprised in it:—1. The formation of railway companies. 2. Procedure upon railway bills in Parliament. 3. Constitution and powers of railway companies. 4. Railway investments, and herein of the law applicable to, and the rules of, the Stock Exchange. 5 and 6. Powers to take land, and compensation. 7. Investment, or payment of purchase money or compensation, and title to land. 8. Powers and obligations to construct and repair the works. 9. Jurisdiction of the Board of Trade. 10. Obligations and restrictions imposed by the statute law on railway companies (Railway and Canal Traffic Act, carriage of the mails and troops, leases, &c.) 11. Arbitration between railway companies. 12. Amalgamation. 13. Rights and liabilities as carriers of passengers and goods. 14. Mandamus. 15. Injunction. 16. Assessment to poor's rate. 17. Dissolution; recovery of deposits. In an Appendix, the statutes and forms are given; also the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords as to Lloyd's Bonds; and the letter and circular of instructions issued by the Board of Trade after receipt of the first notice of intention to open a new railway.

Outlines of Equity, being a Series of Elementary Lectures on Equity Jurisdiction, delivered at the Request of the Incorporated Law Society; with Supplementary Lectures on certain Doctrines of Equity. By FREEMAN OLIVER HAYNES, of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law, and late Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge. Post 8vo., pp. 517. [Maxwell.]

THE lectureship at the Law Institution has enriched our libraries with several works of merit. The Essay of the late Mr. John Adams, on the Doctrine of Equity, founded on his lectures before that institution, was a very able performance, and it is not easy to explain the neglect into which it has fallen; but Mr. Peachey's elaborate Treatise on the Law of Marriage and Family Settlements, and the useful and able elementary work of Mr. Haynes, keep their ground. Nor do we anticipate a smaller measure of success for Mr. Haddan's Outlines of the Administrative Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.

In preparing this second edition of his work, Mr. Haynes has committed the great mistake of not attempting "to alter or rewrite any portion of the lectures, so as to adapt them (in the few cases needful) to the subsequent alterations in the law." In lieu of such alterations, he has made the requisite corrections in notes. But an incorrect text, corrected in notes, is not a form in which any book—least of all one intended for the use of students—should be put forth; and the explanation that the author finds it "distasteful to write in the style suited for oral delivery matter not in fact intended to be used orally," is anything but an excuse. If it is worth anything, it condemns the publication of the lectures.

The present edition is enriched by the reprint, in an Appendix, of Mr. C. Chapman Barber's masterly Statement on Equity Practice and Procedure, which was prepared for the use of the English and Irish Chancery Commission. Some notes and references have been added by Mr. Haynes.

THE COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE AND MONEY) BILLS.

A PETITION in favour of these bills, signed by upwards of 600 barristers, has been presented to the House of Commons. A similar petition to the House of Lords has been as numerously signed, and will lie for some time longer for signature in the libraries of the four Inns of Court.

The petition runs as follows:—

"1. That two bills have been introduced into, and are now pending in, your honourable House, to be intitled "The Courts of Justice Concentration (Site) Act, 1865," and "The Courts of Justice Concentration (Money) Act, 1865."

"2. That the purposes of the said bills are the acquisition of a site for the erection and concentration of the courts of justice, and of the various offices belonging to the same, and to supply means towards defraying the expenses thereof.

"3. That your petitioners cordially approve of the objects of the said bills, and of the means therein proposed for their attainment.

"4. That your petitioners can testify to the many inconveniences arising from the want of sufficient and proper accommodation at the several courts of justice, and from the separation of those courts, and the distance of the Courts at Westminster from the city and the Inns of Court; and your petitioners are fully persuaded that great waste of time and money, and frequent failures of justice, are occasioned by the same causes.

"5. That your petitioners are convinced that no measure short of a complete concentration of the principal courts of justice, such as is proposed by the said bills, can effectually remedy these evils.

"6. That inasmuch as the entire cost of the scheme will ultimately be borne by the suitors in the various courts, it is only just that the site most convenient to the public and the legal profession should be chosen, and that no mere consideration of the embellishment of the metropolis should be allowed to interfere with such choice.

"7. That your petitioners are of opinion that the site proposed in the first of the above-mentioned bills is the one which will best meet the convenience of the public and the legal profession.

"Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that the said bills may pass into law."

THE COUNCIL FOR LAW REPORTING.

THE following appointments have been made of Members of the Council for Reporting according to the scheme of the Bar Committee:—

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, Feb. 20.

COURTS OF JUSTICE SITE BILL.

The Earl of Longford drew the attention of the House to a return which had just been laid upon their Lordships' table, relating to the number of houses to be removed, and of persons to be deprived of their places of residence by the proposed bill. That return gave the number of houses to be removed now upon the seven acres near Temple-bar proposed to be taken, at 151, while the number of persons turned out only appeared to be 302, being two to each house. It occurred to him that there might be some inaccuracy in that return, considering how densely populated the district was, and he had referred to the parliamentary agents, whose names appeared on the back of the bill, who informed him that the number of the owners and leaseholders alone had been given, and not those of the lodgers. He suggested that a supplementary return should be directed, in order to afford the requisite information.

The Lord Chancellor said the question was not as to the accuracy of the return, but merely whether it included all the information required, which, in his opinion, it did not do, as it was a *farce to say that only two persons resided in each house. He would see that a further return was made, which would give the number of lodgers to be turned out by the projected plan.

Lord Shaftesbury remarked, that the return was not in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House, which directed, that before the second reading of any bill involving the removal of houses in the metropolis, a return should be made, stating the number of such houses required, with their character, and the positive and actual number in detail of the persons who would be dispossessed; and, further, whether there was any provision made for their accommodation. The return put the number of houses required at 151, each of which might be assumed to contain from two to twenty rooms, and yet it put the number of inhabitants at only 302. This, on the face of it, was a perfect mockery of a return, and did not, in the slightest degree, pretend to meet the requirements of their Lordships' Standing Orders. He trusted, that the noble Lord on the woolsack would insist upon a proper return being made of the actual number of poor persons, who would be deprived of their homes through their houses being required for the purposes of the Courts of Justice Site Bill.

The Lord Chancellor said he had been much struck with the form of the return, and he would take care that a return was made in accordance with the Standing Orders.

Tuesday, Feb. 21.

The Lord Chancellor, in rising to present a bill to confer a jurisdiction in equity upon the county courts of England and Wales, said—These courts have at present a jurisdiction not extending beyond the authority exercised by the courts of common law. Your Lordships are aware that there is at present a great and marked difference between the subjects that are properly within the jurisdiction of the courts of equity, and those which come under that of the courts of common law. A number of matters in which the poorer classes are materially interested do not come within the range of the jurisdiction of the county courts as at present established, and therefore frequently there is a denial of justice in such cases. For instance, supposing a man in humble circumstances dies intestate; his property may amount to 120*l.*, or even 150*l.*, and he may leave a widow and children, and frequently the widow is the stepmother of the children. It constantly happens that disputes arise among the family with regard to the division of such small estates, and, unfortunately, when they do arise, the only possibility of their being determined under the existing system is by resort to the Court of Chancery. Now, although the expenses of litigation in the Court of Chancery have of late years been much diminished, yet when cases of such small amount arise, they cannot be determined in a court of equity unless they are brought to London, which requires the agency of solicitors residing in London, and also of others in the country. All these necessary communications require the concurrence of these different solicitors, and all matters which demand proof, have to be proved by evidence collected in the country and transmitted to London. The result of this system is, that in the case supposed of a small amount of property, if there be injustice, that injustice cannot be redressed, there being at present no tribunal which can take cognisance of the case, because it does not involve sufficient property to pay the expenses incurred. Another source of great injustice to the poorer classes, and which is also a denial of justice to them, arises in this way:—A dispute may take place between two tradesmen in a country town, who are in partnership, which may lead to a desire to dissolve the partnership, and wind up their affairs by having an account taken, and applying the property in payment of the joint debts. Now, that cannot be done by the county courts under the present system, the only tribunal available being the Court of Chancery; and the expenses of that court are so great as to prevent resort to it in small cases, and it practically, therefore, amounts to a denial of justice. There are many other cases; such, for instance, as small mortgages, involving the necessity of a speedy appeal to some court where the proceedings are not so expensive, nor the process so slow, as of necessity characterises the superior tribunals. There, again, is an urgent necessity for some cheap and speedy remedy to be administered by tribunals which ought to be at the door of the poor man, and to which he might resort in an easy and simple manner. I will not weary your Lordships by adding other instances in support of the principle of the bill, because I believe the necessity of the measure to be generally admitted. The measure I now present to Parliament formed a part of a larger scheme laid before this House last session. My anxiety was excited very much at that time, from observing the great number of persons committed to prison by the process of the county courts, which appears to me to be injurious to the greatest possible extent, and which is founded upon a system which leads poor men into habits of great improvidence, and makes them the slave, in a great measure, of the shopkeeper. My Lords, I am sorry to say that my proposal of last year excited very grave opposition, and though I felt convinced that it would have been a great benefit to the poor man, your Lordships will recollect that I gave up that bill. But I was induced to do so in a great measure because I had succeeded in otherwise making some alterations in the proceedings of county courts which, at that time, I believed would result in much relief to the poor. I am happy to say that my anticipations in that respect have been realised; for I find, that though the rules to which I refer were only made in the end of 1863, and did not come into operation till 1864, while the number of persons actually committed to prison in 1863 was 8583, and in 1862, 9870, the number in 1864 was only 6428, being 2155 less than the number in 1863. There is another alteration in the practice of the county courts which I propose to recommend to the judges of these courts, and, though at first sight it may appear a trifling one, I think it is likely to be very beneficial in its operation. At present the order made by the county court judge may be carried into effect by a sale of the goods of the debtor, or by his imprisonment; but in the first instance it frequently occurs that a time is given for the payment of the debt by monthly instalments. Now, how does this work? Let us suppose the case of a man in humble circumstances, a labourer, for instance, who has been ordered to pay a sum in that way. It may probably happen, that if he has got a shilling, or two or three shillings, in his pocket which he has been saving up against the end of the month, when the instalment is to be paid, some temptation may arise, some emergency may occur, which he is unable to restrain himself from yielding to, and not being in a position to pay the next instalment, he is sent to prison in obedience to the law. I propose to recommend to the county court judges to introduce, as far as they can do so, the practice of ordering the instalments to be paid weekly, instead of monthly; and I have every hope that the result of this change will be to diminish the number of commitments. There is another proposal which I sought to give effect to in the bill of last year, but which is not in the measure now before your Lordships' House. Your Lordships are aware that the term after which debts are barred by the Statute of Limitations is at present six years. By the bill of last year I proposed to reduce that term to one year. I hope to introduce some general measure with the object of reducing the present term, and fixing it at two years, instead of one year—the proposal of last session. There is another proposal, with reference to actions in county courts, which I intend to make one of the subjects of a separate measure—namely, that actions shall not be brought for the score of ale or other liquor consumed in a public-house. As to the bill which I am now about to lay upon your Lordships' table, I hope it may pass through Parliament, for I feel satisfied that it will improve our county court system, and remove from it some of those imperfections which are so much complained of, and which press with severity on the humbler classes.

* [The return was rather fraudulent than farical. But who was the author of the farce or fraud?]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday, Feb. 20.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

Mr. Hibbert obtained leave to introduce a bill permitting capital punishments to be carried out, under certain regulations, within the interior of prisons, and proposed to postpone the second reading till some time after Easter.

Sir G. Grey said this question was under the consideration of the commissioners who were inquiring into the subject of capital punishment.

THE MARRIAGE LAW.

In answer to Sir C. O'Loughlin,

Sir G. Grey said that her Majesty had been advised to issue a commission for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the marriage law.

LEGACY AND SUCCESSION DUTIES.

In answer to Mr. Locke King,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Board of Inland Revenue had no authority, nor could he give them any, to apply generally for the evidence of professional men in regard to collecting and assessing the legacy and succession duties. It would, however, be very agreeable to the Government or the board to receive the assistance of any professional men who were likely to conduct these inquiries. But he had, no doubt, the means of knowing what were the grievances complained of. The Government and the Board of Inland Revenue were cognisant of the additional charge, for instance, over and above the duties themselves. They were, of course, in contact with a body of professional men, whose duty it was to conduct that part of the business on the part of their clients, and it was probably known to the hon. gentleman, that considerable discussion took place last autumn in the public journals, which had the effect of drawing general attention to the subject. There was a certain number of particular cases which were brought before him in connexion with the correspondence inserted in the public journals, and the communications which he had had with the parties on the subject of their complaints pretty well opened to the Government the difficulties that occurred in the administration of the law. That correspondence had not all been brought to a conclusion; but as it was of a public character, there would be no objection, when it was finished, to lay it upon the table. He believed that the result of the inquiry would be, to shew that the principal part of the difficulty was inherent in the nature of the law, and of such taxes. These taxes were more obviously justifiable in principle than, perhaps, many others; but in their administration they were necessarily attended with considerable difficulty. However, he entertained the hope, that in revising a complicated system of procedure in an office of that kind, after a long period had elapsed since a review, it might be found possible to introduce many practical improvements which would afford some satisfaction and relief.

POOR RELIEF IN UNIONS.

Mr. Villiers obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the better distribution of the charge for the relief of the poor in unions.

Tuesday, Feb. 21.

FEES OF PARLIAMENTARY COUNSELL.

Mr. Milner Gibson, in answer to Mr. D. Griffith, said that he was led to the conclusion, from the inquiries he had made, that a counsel practising before committees of the House was at liberty to accept any fee which he might regard as a proper and adequate remuneration for the duties he was discharging. He concluded that counsel might accept any fee that the bar in general might take in the ordinary course of practice.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Sir Colman O'Loughlin, in moving for leave to introduce a bill to amend the law of libel, and for more effectually securing the liberty of the press, said his proposal was, that no indictment should be permitted in cases of libel without the assent of the law officers of the Crown. Such a course would, he believed, prevent the powers of indictment from being abused, and would not, at the same time, deprive our law of one of its most salutary provisions. In cases of indictment, he further proposed that the defendant should be admissible as a witness. He proposed also to get rid of the anomaly at present existing, by which the proprietor of a newspaper was liable for libellous or defamatory matter contained in the publication of speeches made at public meetings, while no action could be laid against the persons who made those speeches. By the bill, therefore, the introduction of which he was moving, a person who went to a public meeting, where reporters must, as he knew, be present, and made such a speech, would be liable, either by civil or criminal action, in the same way as if he had published the libel in writing. Such clause, however, would not affect the privileges of Parliament or courts of justice. It might be said that there would be cases in which such speeches would be made by men of straw; and although he would not deny the possibility of such cases arising, the party injured would have the power of proceeding against the offender criminally, if such a course were sanctioned by the law officers of the Crown. He proposed also allowing the plea of a belief in the correctness of a libel to be admitted as a defence. As newspapers were frequently subject to vexatious actions, he had inserted a clause providing that a plaintiff recovering less than 20s. damages should not only pay his own costs, but also the costs of the defendant, and that his own costs should not be awarded if he did not recover damages above 40s.

Leave was then given to introduce the bill.

In committee of the whole House, resolutions were agreed to in reference to the Courts of Justice Building (Deficiencies) and the Common-law Courts (Fees). Leave was given to introduce bills founded thereupon.

The bills were brought in and read a first time.

Wednesday, Feb. 22.

Mr. Scourfield, in moving the second reading of the Private Bill Costs Bill, stated that it was substantially the same as a bill of last year, which bore the name of Mr. Masey; its object being to inflict costs where cases were got up that were merely colourable, but really illusory and vexatious, by parties who put themselves in other people's way in order to be paid to get out of it.

Mr. Denman thought that this would be a valuable piece of legislation, so far as its spirit was concerned, but that the bill as it stood was a little too large; and he suggested some alterations in the terms.

Mr. Milner Gibson said he had doubts as to the expediency of this measure, suggesting cases in which it might work injuriously, and thought the House ought to be extremely cautious as to the wording of the bill, so as not to throw unnecessary obstacles in the way of valuable improvements.

The bill was read a second time, and referred to a select committee.

FELONY AND MISDEMEANOUR EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE BILL.

Mr. Denman, in moving the second reading of this bill, explained that the first portion of the measure enabling counsel for the prisoners to sum up evidence at the end of the defence was in all respects similar to the provisions of the bill of 1860. The remaining provisions had likewise for their object to assimilate the procedure in criminal cases to the practice already existing in civil actions. They related principally to different methods of testing the credibility of witnesses, and also to the proof of formal but important documents.

Mr. Roebuck said, this bill afforded an admirable specimen of English legislation. A rule had been established in civil cases which his hon. and learned friend desired to extend to criminal cases; but instead of saying in so many words, that all the rules of evidence now applicable in civil cases should in future be applicable to criminal cases, he felt it necessary to repeat every one of the clauses, thereby encumbering the statute-book with an unnecessary mass of verbiage.

Sir G. Grey, in the absence of the Attorney-General, assented to the second reading of the bill, which, he thought, would prove a very useful measure.

Mr. Lowe said, the suggestion of Mr. Roebuck, though very plausible, could not safely be acted upon, otherwise the result would be, that, as in civil suits, all admissions given by the prisoner under any circumstances would be admissible against him.

The bill was then read a second time.

Mr. Denman explained, that the course suggested by the hon. and learned member for Sheffield had not escaped him. But in practice such a mode of legislation proved very inconvenient, because it entailed upon the judges and the profession the necessity of referring from one act of Parliament to another to ascertain what the law really was. It was better to put in black and white what the Legislature actually meant; and then, if there were repetitions, it would facilitate the process of consolidation hereafter.

The bill was then ordered to be committed.

We have to record the death of Joseph Goodeve, Esq., of the Inner Temple, and of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, which took place on the 29th ult., at Clifton, near Bristol. Mr. Goodeve was a well-known and popular member of the Chancery Bar until his departure for India, and a short memoir of his life will be acceptable to many of his old friends. He was born at Gosport on the 23rd September, 1801, and after a pupillage under the learned lawyer Park, practised for some time as a conveyancer, and was called to the bar in 1829. He was a frequent speaker at the Forensic Society, and the London Debating Society, which at that time occupied a far more prominent position than at present; and he wrote numerous articles on law and on political economy in the Law Magazines and the Westminster Review, following Bentham in law, and Ricardo in political economy. One article in particular, upon imprisonment for debt, attracted much attention, advocating views then novel, but now familiar, and carried into effect by changes in the law. He was also, in later life, the author of "the Law of Evidence, as administered in England and applied to India," which is the standard work upon the subject. After attaining a very good practice at the Chancery Bar, much to the surprise of his friends, in the year 1855 he gave up his prospects here, and went out to Calcutta, in order to practise at the bar there. He obtained very fair success, and shortly afterwards was nominated by Lord Canning to a puisne judgeship. Sir C. Wood claimed the patronage, and refused to ratify the appointment; and from this unfortunate official quarrel Mr. Goodeve lost the judgeship. In 1861 he was appointed Master of the High Court at Calcutta; but his ill luck again pursued him, as the office was, in 1863, by some mistake or omission, allowed to lapse under the New Procedure Act. He was thus, at this late period of life, obliged to return to the bar, and was obtaining a large practice, when his health began to fail, and he was advised to try a voyage to England; but the Indian climate had done its work, and after a short illness he sank as above mentioned. Amongst his other avocations, he was for some time Professor of English Law at the Presidency College, and delivered a course of lectures there. He was married, in 1834, to Louise Stuart Barker, daughter of T. C. Barker, by whom he had three children, who survive him; and he married, in 1863, a second wife, Clara Eliza, daughter of W. G. Thompson, Esq., by whom he had two children, who also survive. Mr. Goodeve was affectionately loved by his family, and he possessed the faculty of obtaining and retaining the attachment of his friends, of whom he had an unusual number, and by whom his death is sincerely regretted.

INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCE.

"The essential feature of an Indisputable Policy is, that it is granted on one condition, that the person assured 'is now living.' Such is the form of expression devised by that astute of lawyers the present Lord Chancellor, to exclude all questions of fraud or misrepresentations. The Society (the Indisputable Life Assurance) appears to act on this principle; and we are glad to learn that their financial condition is such as we should have anticipated from the carrying on of their business on what are obviously sound as well as equitable principles."—JOURNAL OF JURISPRUDENCE, December, 1864.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 4, 1865.

THE approaching dissolution of Parliament, and consequent general election, has given full work to the revising barristers at their respective courts. Parliamentary agents of both parties have been unusually vigilant in their duties, and the result has been an addition of a large number of new decisions to those which already guide revising barristers at their respective revisions. There were as many as twenty-two appeals from the decisions of revising barristers sent up to the Court of Common Pleas in Michaelmas Term. The Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, by sect. 42 provides, "that it shall be lawful for any person who shall have made any claim to be inserted in any list, or made any objection to any other person as not entitled to have his name inserted in any list, or whose name shall have been expunged from any list, and who, in any such case, shall be dissatisfied with any decision of any revising barrister on any point of law material to the result of such case, to give to the revising barrister in court, before the rising of the court, a notice in writing, that he is desirous to appeal, and in such notice shall shortly state the decision against which he desires to appeal; and the said barrister thereupon, if he thinks it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be entertained, shall state in writing the facts material to the matter in question, and shall also state his decision upon the whole case, and upon the point of law appealed against; and the said barrister shall read the statement to the appellant in open court, and shall then and there sign the same, and the appellant, or some one on his behalf, shall, at the end of the said statement, make a declaration in writing to the following effect—that is to say, 'I appeal from this decision;' and the said barrister shall indorse the same with the name of the parish or township, and the name of the appellant and respondent; and the appellant shall transmit the same to the Court of Common Pleas." It is necessary to call attention to the exact provisions of this enactment, because it has been held expressly, in the case of Scott, App., Durant, Resp., decided in Hilary Term last, and reported 11 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 115, that the formalities required by this section must be strictly followed, and cannot even be waived by consent of the parties. In that case there was a great deal of business before the revising barrister, and the hour being late, the parties agreed to waive the formalities required by the 42nd section, and to agree upon a case, to be signed by the barrister at his chambers in London; but the Court made a rule absolute to strike this appeal out of the list, on the ground that there was no appeal before the Court. The Registration Act gives the power of granting or refusing an appeal absolutely to the revising barrister. We may, therefore, assume that most of the appeals sent up involve questions of importance in election and registration law. It may then, perhaps, be useful to glance at some of the more important cases. The case of Gaydon, App., Bancroft, Resp. (10 Jur., N.S., 1206), is a most important decision. It will probably have the effect of adding some thousands to the number of electors in cities and boroughs. The Reform Act (2 Will. 4, c. 45), by sect. 32, which reserved the old freemen's franchise, provided that no person should be entitled to vote as a burgess in respect of birth unless his right be originally derived from or through some person who was a burgess or freeman, or entitled to be admitted a burgess or freeman, previously to the 31st March, 1831." The facts, as stated in the case, were, that in the borough of Barnstaple there is a body of freemen; the sons of these freemen are entitled, on proving their father's marriage, that they were born of that marriage, and that they have attained the age of twenty-one years, to be admitted freemen of the borough. The claimant's grandfather was admitted a freeman in 1811; the claimant's father in May, 1831, just two months too late to claim through his father. The claimant was admitted a freeman of the borough in 1856. The Court held, that the claimant was entitled to the franchise of a freeman, as claiming through his grandfather. Mr. Justice Byles, in giving judgment in this case, observed "Unless we hold the claimant entitled to vote, we give no value to the word 'through.' Every freeman who can claim through a freeman who was a freeman on the 31st March, 1831, will henceforward be entitled to be put on the list of voters." The next case was that of Blain, App., Pilkington, Resp. (10 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 1237). The question in that case turned on the powers and jurisdiction of revising barristers. The facts were very circumstantial, but are very likely to occur again. They were as follows:—The revising barrister appointed to revise the list of voters for the Southern Division of the county of Lancaster, finding it impossible to complete the revision within the time prescribed by the statute, applied to the senior judge of assize to appoint a coadjutor, which was done. At a court held at Bury, before the revising barrister, who was originally appointed to revise the lists, the claimant's name was objected to; the objector was present; but as neither the claimant, or any person on his behalf, was in attendance to support the claim, the revising barrister disallowed the vote, and expunged the claimant's name from the list. The revising barrister was unable to complete the revision at Bury on the day appointed for that purpose, but the list in which the claimant's name occurred was complete, and was initialled by the revising barrister. On a subsequent day the revision of the lists for the borough of Bury was continued by the barrister who was appointed to assist in the revision; on this occasion the claimant attended, and gave a satisfactory reason for his absence. It was then objected that the barrister had then no power to entertain the question. That the list was complete; besides, on this occasion, the objector was not present. The revising barrister being satisfied of the validity of the claimant's vote, restored the name to the list; but the Court of Common Pleas, in-ⁱⁿ⁻held, that the revising barrister had no power to enter-ⁱⁿ⁻tain the question; that the matter was "res-ⁱⁿ⁻ok at cata." Erle, C.J., says, "the trial of a question between a claimant and an objector is a trial in foro contentioso." Something was made in the argument, of the revising barrister on the first occasion having initialled the list, but it is clear from the judgment of Chief Justice Erle, that the ratio decidendi was the fact, that on the second occasion the objector was not before the Court. The next case was that of Powell, App., Guest, Resp. (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1238). It was a question of "residence." The claimant had resided in a borough until the 7th February, 1864, when he was convicted of a misdemeanour, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The gaol was more than seven miles from the borough. The claimant while in gaol kept a house in the borough, but no family had resided in it, but it was occupied by his servant. The cases of bankrupts and persons in prison for debt were referred to in the course of the argument. The Court held, that the claimant had not resided in the borough for the six months previous to the 31st July, and was therefore, not entitled to have his name on the list of persons qualified to vote. Chief Justice Erle, in the course of his judgment, pointed out a distinction between persons who had the power of returning to their residence whenever they pleased, and persons who were prevented from returning by the consequences of their own wrongful acts. The decision must be considered satisfactory. A person who commits a misdemeanour had certainly better not exercise the franchise. He cannot be said to be a proper person to vote at an election, for a constituent part of the governing body of the country. A person who cannot keep the law had better leave the making of the law, whether directly or indirectly, to others. The next case was Steele, App., Bosworth, Resp. (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1239), which was a claim to the county franchise by certain inmates of a charitable institution, called the Bottesford Hospital, established in the year 1692 by a Duke of Rutland, for the benefit of twelve poor men, to be nominated by the Duke of Rutland for the time being, and removable by him in case of misconduct. The revenues of the hospital arose out of land vested in trustees for the purposes of the hospital. Each inmate had a separate room, and received certain allowances, amounting in the whole to more than 40s. per annum, and it was contended that each inmate was entitled to vote as a 40s. freeholder; but the Court held, that the inmates had no interest whatever in the lands of the charity, but only a right to certain allowances payable out of the rent of the lands; and Chief Justice Erle referred to the case of Freeman, App., Gainsford, Resp. (11 C. B., N. S., 68), where Mr. Justice Williams says, on facts, almost similar, "The question is, whether the claimant has any property. The occupants are to take for their lives; but it does not therefore follow, that each particular room is assigned to each of them as owner for his life. It seems to me to be clear, that he has not the right of an equitable owner for life. Having a right to be so supplied, does not constitute them equitable owners of the rooms in which they are placed." The next case was Powell, App., Bradley, Resp. (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1241). There the Court held, that "a voter need not have been of full age during the whole period of twelve months' occupation previous to the 31st July, as required by the 27th section of the Reform Act. In this case, the claimant's vote for the borough of Kidderminster was objected to, on the ground that he only attained the age of twenty-one in the March before the revision, and that he, therefore, could not have occupied his house twelve months previous to the 31st July. It was contended on behalf of the appellant, that the Reform Act, in sect. 27, provides, that "such person" shall have occupied for twelve months previous to the 31st July;" and that by "such person" was meant, as pointed out by the act, "a male person of full age." The revising barrister held the claimant entitled to be upon the list, and the Court of Common Pleas upheld his decision. As Mr. Justice Byles said, if the Court decided that the claimant must have been of full age all the time he occupied, the result would be to postpone the claimant's right to vote till he attained the age of twenty-two. It is remarkable, that some of the points raised in the foregoing cases had never been raised even incidentally before; and in some there were no authorities whatever to cite. The decision in Gaydon, App., Bancroft, Resp., will add large numbers to the lists in some cities and boroughs. Blain, App., Pilkington, Resp., shews what is the nature of an inquiry before a revising barrister; and Powell, App., Bradley, Resp., is an authority to shew that a claimant need not have been of full age during the whole time he has occupied a tenement, provided he be of full age at the time of the revision.

It will be seen that the Lord Chancellor's bill to confer on the county courts a limited jurisdiction in equity is more extensive in its scope than the bill of the last session. It provides, that "Every suit or matter that may now be commenced and prosecuted in the High Court of Chancery, may hereafter be brought and prosecuted in the county courts," subject to certain limitations as to the amount or value of the matter in question, and with the exception of the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices in lunacy. As it is proposed that the equity jurisdiction of the county courts shall commence on the 1st October next, we recommend the learned judges not to rely on the wisdom of Parliament, but to enter upon their equity studies at once. Upwards of fifty learned and elderly gentlemen, calling frantically for equity and conveyancing coaches, will furnish a novel and interesting spectacle. Let us hope that under the power to make rules and orders, the committee of judges, with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, will be able and willing to appoint a staff of "conveyancing and equity counsel to the county courts."

Not the least difficult part of the task imposed upon the learned judges is the interpretation of the act itself. For instance, the first act that occurs in Mr. Morgan's Collection of Statutes relating to the Practice and Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, is the Custody of Infants Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 54), giving jurisdiction as to the custody of children under the age of seven years, irrespective of property. The bill says, that county courts shall have jurisdiction in all matters relating to the custody of infants where the annual sum applicable to the maintenance of the infant shall not exceed the sum of 20l. per annum. Does this give jurisdiction under the act of 2 & 3 Vict., if no fund at all is applicable to the infant's maintenance; that is to say, in almost every case which can arise under that act, both parents being living? May the most exalted of her Majesty's subjects be brought before any one of the county courts in England and Wales (for in this matter of the custody of infants the choice of the court is left open) to contest the right to the custody of his children?

The next act in Mr. Morgan's Collection is the Perpetuating of Testimony Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 69), under which, as extended by Lord Westbury to the county courts, any testimony relating to his Lordship's title or estates, or to any other title or estates, may be laid up or "perpetuated" in any county court.

The next act in Mr. Morgan's book is the Attorneys and Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), under which, in conjunction with the proposed act, solicitors' bills to any amount will be taxable in any county court. For as the "matter" will be "commenced" by the client, with a view to the reduction of the solicitor's demand, it will not be within the provision limiting the sum "demanded or sought to be recovered by the plaintiff" to 100*l.*, or within any other limitation in the bill.

The provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act come next, under which compensation money for lands may in certain cases be paid into the bank. It seems that money so paid in may be got out upon petition to the judge of any county court, if the amount do not exceed 100*l.*

Under the Trustee Act, 1850, it seems that the judge of any court within the district of which the trustees, or the cestuis que trust, or any one of them respectively, usually reside, may appoint a new trustee, make a vesting order &c., if the estate or property, the subject of the trust, does not exceed 300*l.* in value. If an order is made, and it subsequently appears that the value of the trust property exceeded the limit, the order will be wholly invalid; for the 5th section of the bill does not apply after the matter is out of court. In investigating titles, the inquiry as to the total value of the trust property, in cases of appointments of new trustees and vesting orders made by judges of county courts, will form a handsome addition to the duties of the purchaser's solicitor.

Under the Improvement of Jurisdiction of Equity Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86), it may be that the judges of the county courts would have authority to direct evidence to be taken on oath before notaries and others abroad, and otherwise, in manner provided by that act; but the penalties imposed by the act for false swearing &c. would be inapplicable. And it seems that affidavits sworn before commissioners to administer oaths in Chancery would not be available in the county courts.

The bill gives to the county courts unlimited jurisdiction to enforce by injunction contracts not to carry on a business or profession within certain limits; so that Mad. Titiens or Baron Rothschild might be brought before such a court upon a question of singing at Covent-garden, or carrying on business in the city. Again, a partnership of the most lucrative and expensive nature, between brokers or commission or insurance agents, might be dissolved in a county court, if the joint capital and credits did not exceed 500*l.* On the other hand, jurisdiction in matters of discovery is given without limit.

Lord Westbury, with a lively recollection of the persuasive power of fees, provides, that for equitable business transacted in the county courts (in addition to fees to the registrars and high bailiffs, according to a scale to be settled by the Treasury, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor) there shall be taken fees in augmentation of the salaries of the judges, within the limit of 1600*l.*, the amounts of such fees being subject to the sole discretion of the Lord Chancellor.

The careless and unskilful construction of the bill is of a piece with the folly of the design. Whether the existing distinction between the two sides of Westminster Hall as to the rules of right ought to be preserved, is a question upon which, perhaps, professional opinion is sufficiently settled to justify careful legislation. But it is obvious that so great a change—going down to the ancient depths and foundations of the law, and extending to the minutest ramifications of its modern development, would require the highest jurisprudential and legislative ability to initiate, and the greatest judicial learning and capacity to carry into effect. In such ability the Lord Chancellor is notoriously deficient, as he has, from his first assumption of the uncongenial character of a law reformer, most successfully demonstrated. Indeed, for aught that appears, he has not yet realised a conception of the essential distinction, both in theory and for practical purposes, between those functions of the Court of Chancery which are judicial and remedial, and those which are merely administrative. We will not insult the many learned and able men who are to be found among the judges of the county courts, by comparing their unfitness (in their present position) to perform the task of working out the fusion of law and equity, with the incapacity of Lord Westbury to set them such a task. But the order of county court judges also includes, we fear, many who might justly be subjected to such a comparison. However that may be, it certainly is not in the county courts that the experiment of the fusion of law and equity should be made, for the successful conduct of which, all the judicial and forensic ability of Westminster Hall would be barely adequate.

The expediency of transferring the administrative functions of the Court of Chancery in small matters to the county courts, is a practical question which might properly be referred to a commission of inquiry. It will probably be found that the present system might be greatly improved (retaining in all cases the central control of the judges and principal officers of the Court of Chancery), by establishing some provincial branches, and by investing the county court judges with some of the powers and functions now exercised and discharged in chambers by the equity judges and their clerks.

WIFE'S SEPARATE REAL ESTATE, AND HER POWER OF ALIENATION.

[From a Correspondent.]

A CASE of first importance on this subject has lately occurred before the Lord Chancellor. It is the case of Taylor v. Meads, on appeal from the Master of the Rolls (reported in the current number of THE JURIST (11 Jur. 166), and 13 Weekly Rep. 394). The point to which we are about to refer was not argued before the Master of the Rolls, but his decision upon another point having been reversed by the Lord Chancellor, this question arose—namely, whether, where real property is devised to trustees and their heirs, upon trust for a married woman, her heirs and assigns, with a declaration that the said premises should be for the separate use of the married woman, free from the debts, &c. of her husband, she could, by force of her jus disponendi, devise her estate while covert? And depending on the same principles was the question, whether she could by deed inter vivos, not acknowledged under the act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74 (Fines and Recoveries Act), dispose of her equitable fee-simple? The Lord Chancellor decided both these questions in the affirmative, not feeling any doubt upon the subject, and, in his own words, held, "that a feme covert, not restrained from alienation, has, as incident to her separate estate, and without any express power, a complete right of alienation by instrument inter vivos or will." We are by no means inclined to disagree with this decision, when we look at the question as one of policy; and, indeed, we shall be glad to find that the doctrine as to the separate estate of a married woman, which has been so often the source of litigation and the most refined argument, can be placed on the clear, broad grounds enunciated by the Lord Chancellor. His Lordship says, "With respect to separate property, the feme covert is, by the form of trust, released and freed from the fetters and disability of coverture, and invested with the rights and powers of a person who is sui juris. To every estate and interest held by a person who is sui juris the common law attaches a right of alienation." Both these propositions we believe to be perfectly correct, and borne out by decisions, and yet we fear that the conclusion drawn from them by the Lord Chancellor, namely, that therefore the feme covert can deal with the entire fee-simple as if she were a feme sole, is illogical. His Lordship's fallacy seems to be this—he spreads the separate use clause over the entire fee, instead of over that portion of it only which requires protection from marital rights and marital influence, namely, the estate for life of the wife; and his syllogism would be perfect if his decision as to the power of alienation were confined to the estate for life of the wife. The original innovation by our courts of equity on the common law in favour of separate use was solely for the purpose of protecting the wife from the influence of the husband, and to secure her a separate provision; and the contest as to this was sharp enough between our courts of law and equity; but in those days the equitable innovation was never attempted to be applied ultra the estate for life of the feme covert; and, indeed, the principle and object of the innovation did not apply. His Lordship continues to observe—"But it would be contrary to the whole principle of the doctrine of separate use, to require consent or concurrence of the husband in the act or instrument by which the wife's separate estate is dealt with or disposed of; that would be to make her subject to his control or interference." There seems to have been here some part of his Lordship's reasoning omitted from the report; this passage evidently points to the fact, that by the 77th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, the consent of the husband is rendered absolutely necessary to the deed to be acknowledged by a feme covert; but there is no allusion to this in the report.

We agree with the Lord Chancellor that this provision of the statute could have no application to separate estate. But here, again, the question arises, what is the extent of the separate estate? If it only extends to the life estate of the feme, as we have suggested, then there is nothing contrary to the doctrine of separate use in requiring the consent to, or concurrence of, the husband in a deed, by which the wife deals with her reversion or remainder; and no argument can be drawn from this section in favour of his Lordship's conclusion. We believe that it will, upon the examination of the authorities, be found to be indisputable, that the imposition of the separate use clause has never been held to apply to more than the life estate of the feme; indeed, it seems to us, that, viewing the question from an a priori point of view, it would be absurd to suppose that the original innovation on the common law could have been intended by our courts of equity to have been carried so much further than the necessity demanded; and in confirmation of this view we have the fact, that when it became doubtful whether the mere separate use clause was effectual for the purpose of protecting the wife's estate, Lord Thurlow contrived the clause against anticipation in addition, which would have effectually defeated the jus disponendi, not only over the estate for life of the wife, but her estate in remainder in fee. As from a priori reasoning, so from the authorities, we think it settled that the effect of the separate use clause extends no further than the life estate of the feme.

It has often been decided, that real property settled to the separate use of a feme covert is liable, as such, to her separate debts, so far as the rents and profits of that estate extends; but it has never been argued, much less decided, that such debts bind the fee-simple. The principle of such decisions is this, that as a feme covert is unable to contract debts, except as regards her separate estate, and such debts are looked upon as debts not of the feme but of the separate estate, the moment that separate estate ceases, which it does upon the death of the feme, there ceases to be any estate liable to those debts. We are far from thinking that this is a desirable state of the law; but yet it follows, as a necessity, unless the large and liberal view of the Lord Chancellor be right; for it would be absurd to hold that the mere debts, or quasi debts, of the feme covert could bind the fee-simple of the feme, if a deed unacknowledged could not. But it seems to us to follow, that if the feme covert can by simple deed unacknowledged alienate her fee-simple, her separate debts must bind the fee in equity, just as much as if she were a feme sole.

According to the report of the case now under our consideration, the Lord Chancellor contented himself with enunciating a few principles of the doctrine of separate use, but he did not examine the authorities, and he only named the following cases:—Peacock v. Monk (2 Ves. 101); Tullett v. Armstrong (1 Beav. 1; 4 My. & C. 390); Baggot v. Mann (1 Ph. 627); Atchison v. Le Mann (23 Law T. 302); and Adams v. Gamble (11 Ir. Eq. Rep. 269; 12 Ir. Eq. Rep. 102); and citing the following passage from Lord St. Leonards' Treatise on Powers, 8th ed., p. 173:—"Where a married woman has property settled to her separate use, without any restraint on alienation, she is deemed a feme sole, and may dispose of it accordingly." Now, doubtless, this passage correctly states the law, but it does not go far enough to support the Lord Chancellor's decision. What is the meaning of that small word "it"? We take it that it means such property as she is entitled to, and is affected by the separate use clause; so that we come back to the question, where the estate is a fee, and the feme has it to her separate use, does the separate use affect that portion of the fee subsequent to her own life estate? If it does not, the passage from Lord St. Leonards does not help the argument of the Lord Chancellor.

Let us now turn to the cases relied on by the Lord Chancellor. In Peacock v. Monk (2 Ves. sen. 190) the house which was the subject of the suit had been purchased by the feme covert, out of her separate savings, and was conveyed direct to her and her heirs, so that there was no separate use imposed; but some of Lord Hardwicke's observations on the subject of separate estate are most valuable. His Lordship says, p. 190, "Agreements for settling estates to the separate use of the wife on marriage are very frequent, relating both to real and personal estate. As to personal, undoubtedly, where there is an agreement between husband and wife before marriage, that the wife shall have to her separate use, either the whole or particular parts, she may dispose of it by an act in her life or will; she may do it by either, though nothing is said of the manner of disposing of it; but there is a much stronger ground in that case than can be in the case of real estate, because that is to take effect during the life of the husband; for if the husband survives, he is entitled to the whole, and none can come into a share with the husband on the Statute of Distribution. Then such an agreement binds and bars the husband, and consequently bars everybody. But it is very different as to real estate; for her real estate will descend to her heir-at-law. . . . Undoubtedly, on her marriage, a woman may take such a method, that she may dispose of that real estate from going to her heir-at-law; that is, she may do it without a fine; but I doubt whether it can be done but either by way of trust or of power over an use. In the first instance, suppose a woman having a real estate before marriage, and either before or after marriage by a proper conveyance (if after the marriage it must be by fine) conveys that to trustees, in trust to herself during her coverture for her separate use, and afterwards that it should be in trust for such person as she shall by any writing under her hand and seal, or in nature of a will, appoint; and in default of appointment to her heirs; she marries, and makes such appointment as that described: that is a good declaration of the trust; and this Court would support the trust . . . so may it be done by way of power over an use."

We have quoted this latter paragraph of Lord Hardwicke's judgment fully, as it seems to us that the Lord Chancellor has, in the case of Taylor v. Meade, attributed too much weight to the circumstance of the legal estate being in trustees. His Lordship says—"The whole lies between a married woman and her trustees, and the true theory of her alienation is, that any instrument, be it deed or writing, when signed by her, operates as a direction to the trustees to convey or hold the estate according to the new trust which is created by such direction. This is sufficient to convey the feme covert's equitable interest."

This seems to us to be directly opposed to the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, for he grounds the effect in equity of the feme's direction of the trust, expressly upon the assumption that there was an express power to direct the trust, just as it would be necessary to have the express power to appoint a use. In truth, the effect of the Lord Chancellor's decision in Taylor v. Meade, is to give to the mere words "separate use" the same ample effect as if there was in the deed the fullest form of words which a conveyancer could devise giving the feme powers of disposition. It may be said, that as the doubt expressed by Lord Hardwicke (supra), whether an anti-nuptial contract between husband and wife, that she shall have her real estate to her separate use, would bind her heir in case of her devising it away, has been cleared up by the decisions of Wright v. Cadogan (1 B. P. C. 486) and Rippon v. Dawding (Amb. 565), in favour of the wife's power to devise; therefore, where there is a limitation to the wife's separate use, à multo fortiori, she may devise. But when these cases are examined, it will be found that the anti-nuptial contract was, that the wife should have power notwithstanding coverture to dispose of her property by deed or will. And Mr. Roper, in his Treatise on Husband and Wife, vol. 2, p. 178, explains the principle of those cases. He says, "The agreement having been made before marriage, at a period when the wife was able to contract; and as it clearly appears to have been the intention of the parties that the wife would reserve to herself a power to dispose of her own lands during the coverture, she therefore, and the persons claiming under her appointment, have a right to the interposition of a court of equity to give full effect to the marriage agreement . . . the wife might have obliged her husband to concur in a fine and settlement of the estate pursuant to his engagement."

The only result, therefore, of those two cases is, that a court of equity, if called upon to enforce such an anti-nuptial contract, would order such a settlement as would give the wife power to dispose of her property by deed or will, and we submit that it would order the insertion, in such a settlement, of the ordinary powers to appoint by deed or will. Those decisions, therefore, do not touch the present question.

In the report of Peacock v. Monk, the reporter states that a case was cited at the bar, "where a real estate of a wife was by settlement before marriage secured to her separate use, and as if she was a feme sole, but no power given her to devise it; and it was insisted, that as to the trust of this estate she was to be considered as a feme sole in this court; and compared to personal estate the separate property of the wife, to which property it was incident that she may make a will, or appointment of it. It was said, that as to land there was a difference, for that the husband could not give her power to make a will of lands; and that the heir-at-law was concerned in not being disinherited, but in such a way as that she should be secretly examined; and in that way did Willes, C. J. (who said he had consulted the other judges about it), determine."

The next case referred to by the Lord Chancellor is Tullett v. Armstrong (4 My. & C. 345); the question, as every lawyer knows, was solely as to the validity of the clause against anticipation, superadded to a separate use of real estate given to a feme sole, and whether upon marriage that clause took effect; which question was decided in the affirmative. But the case is valuable besides, for Lord Cottenham's review of the doctrine of separate estate. There is, however, not one word in favour of the decision of the present Lord Chancellor; but in some instances Lord Cottenham's statement of the law is against him; for instance, at p. 393 he says, "When once it was established that the separate estate of a married woman was to be so far enjoyed by her as a feme sole, as to bring with it all the incidents of property, and that she might, therefore, dispose of it as a feme sole might do, it was found that, to secure the desired protection against the marital rights, it was necessary to qualify and fetter the gift of the separate estate by prohibiting anticipation." It is quite clear from this, that Lord Cottenham was speaking only of the estate which, by the imposition of the separate use, had interfered with the marital rights, that is, the life estate of the wife.

The next case referred to by the Lord Chancellor is the case of Baggot v. Moss (1 Ph. 627). The question there was simply, whether a clause in restraint of alienation annexed to a legal devise in fee of real estate to a married woman for her separate use was effectual as regards the whole fee during the coverture; and Lord Cottenham held, affirming Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce (1 Col. C. C. 138), that the clause was effectual. His Lordship, in a very short judgment, said, "After the case of Tullett v. Armstrong, there can be no doubt about the doctrine of this Court respecting the property given to the separate use of a married woman. And it is clear that that doctrine applies as much to an estate in fee as to a life estate. The object of the doctrine was to give a married woman the enjoyment of property independent of her husband; but, to secure that object, it was absolutely necessary to restrain her during coverture from alienation. The reasoning evidently applies to a fee as much as to a life estate; to real property as much as to personal. The power of a married woman, independent of the trust for separate use, may be different in real estate from what it is in personal; but a court of equity, having created in both a new species of estate, may in both cases modify the incidents of that estate."

Now, can it be inferred from this, that his Lordship was of opinion that, had the clause against anticipation been omitted, the wife could, without the solemnities of a fine formerly, or of a deed acknowledged since the 3 & 4 Will. 4, have effectually conveyed away her fee-simple?

We submit that it would be a very extraordinary result of a doctrine of equity, established for the protection of the married woman against the rights and the control of the husband, to throw her more under his control, and enable her by a simple deed to alienate, not only her life estate but also the remainder of her fee, which the common law as well as courts of equity considered hers, but the common law practically protected her from her husband's influence, by requiring the formalities of a fine. Such could never have been the original intention of our courts of equity in introducing the doctrine of separate use, and is clearly against Lord Hardwicke's view of the doctrine. But are we left in doubt whether Lord Cottenham meant that a feme covert could alienate her separate estate in fee by a deed unacknowledged? We think not; for upon counsel's drawing his Lordship's attention to the fact, that the Irish Fines and Recoveries Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 92, s. 69, contained a proviso, that the clauses relating to conveyances by married women should not apply to cases in which there was, by the terms of the gift, a restraint on alienation, whereas there was no such proviso in the English act.

His Lordship observed, "that the Irish act was subsequent in date to the other, and that he took that clause to be an expression by the Legislature of what was meant by the former act."

Now, to our minds, this conclusively shews that his Lordship considered that separate estate [commonly called such] of a married woman was within the Fines and Recoveries Act, for if not the above proviso would have been unnecessary, as restraint against alienation could not exist but with reference to separate estate.

We are precluded, therefore, from reasoning on Lord Cottenham's decision in favour of the clause against alienation extending to the whole fee, in this manner: A feme covert, having property in fee-simple to her separate use, is in equity considered a feme sole for all purposes of alienation. The clause against alienation and the separate use clause when together are co-extensive and coterminous. The clause against alienation extends to the entire fee. Ergo, the feme covert, having property in fee to her separate use absolutely, is in equity considered a feme sole as to the entire fee.

We now come to the case of Atchison v. Le Mann (23 Law T. 302), and heard before the full court of appeal, consisting of Lord Cranworth, C., and the Lords Justices; but although it seems, from Lord Justice Turner's judgment, that the question, whether, where there is a limitation in fee to a married woman for her separate use, she can devise it, was argued in that case, yet his Lordship also states, that it was unnecessary to decide it. However, on that point he said, "But I am very strongly inclined to think she could have done so; and as at present advised, I should so decide the point, if it were necessary to decide it. It being settled, that an estate in fee may be limited to the separate use of a married woman, thus giving her an absolute ownership, she must, I think, have all the rights of disposition which are incident to the ownership." There can be no doubt that this was a very strong extra-judicial opinion upon the point, if such words were ever uttered; but from what immediately follows these words, it is manifest that there is some material error in the report, as the cases of *Stead v. Clay (1 Sim. 294) and Wainwright v. Hardisty (2 Beav. 365) do not bear upon the proposition for which the reporter makes the Lord Justice cite them; and, further down the report, makes the Lord Justice misstate the doubt Lord Hardwicke had in Peacock v. Monk (ubi sup.), jumbling up "wife" for "heir," and "heir" for "wife." We may here observe, that on the argument of Taylor v. Meads, the case of Field v. Moore (7 De G., Mac., & G. 691) was not cited, although in that case there were some dicta of Lord Justice Turner, or approval of the statement of the law by other judges equally strong the other way from the dicta attributed to him in Atchison v. Le Mann.

The last case referred to by the Lord Chancellor is Adams v. Gamble (12 Ir. Eq. 102), which was evidently treated by his Lordship, as it is in fact, the first direct authority upon the point. The case came originally before the Lord Chancellor (11 Ir. Eq. 269), when his Lordship held, that a feme covert, having a descendible freehold to her separate use, could not alienate it, except by fine or deed acknowledged. From that decree there was an appeal, heard before the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Justice of Appeal, and Baron Hughes, when the Lord Chancellor held to his opinion, and the two other members of the Court reversed his decision.

It is curious to observe, that the majority of the Court in that case seem to consider that they were only deciding in conformity with previous decisions; and yet this very decision forms the sole direct authority upon the point in Taylor v. Meads.

The Lord Justice of Appeal and Mr. Baron Hughes rely much upon the dicta of Lord Justice Turner in Atchison v. Le Mann; and Mr. Baron Hughes, after reading the report, says, "I quite concur in this expression of opinion, and it appears to me to be in accordance with the principle upon which the recognition of a separate estate has always proceeded."

There was one case of very late occurrence, which was cited before his Lordship on the argument of Taylor v. Meads, and which we think deserved consideration; we mean the case of Lechmere v. Brothridge (32 Beav. 353; 11 Weekly Rep. 814), containing a most carefully considered judgment of Sir J. Romilly, M.R. In that case the Master of the Rolls held, that where real property is given to trustees, upon trust for a married woman for life to her separate use, without a clause against anticipation, she can dispose of her life estate by a deed not acknowledged, but that where the fee-simple is given to the separate use of a married woman, she cannot dispose of the fee otherwise than by a deed duly acknowledged, under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74. His Honor says, "The question is, whether the words 'separate use,' as applied to a devise of freehold hereditaments to a married woman in fee-simple, have such an effect as to give her a different quality of estate, in the contemplation of equity, as to the manner in which she may alienate the same, from what she would have taken in the same hereditaments, if the words 'separate use' had been omitted from the devise. I am of opinion, that in such a devise the words 'separate use' have, as regards the alienation of the inheritance of the property, no such practical effect; that if a married woman had attempted, before the statute, to dispose of such lands, she must have levied a fine; and that, since the statute, an acknowledgment, under the 77th section, is equally necessary."

His Honor then observes, that the contention of the other side is, "that the words 'separate use,' as regards alienation inter vivos, have the following, and no other, meaning, viz. 'I give my estate to A. and her heirs for ever for her separate use; that is, I do so in order to enable her to dispose of it without any acknowledgment under the statute.' I am of opinion, that it is not in the power of any testator to avoid the statute."

* Probably Stead v. Creagh (9 Mod. 43) was referred to.

His Honor then very pertinently observes:—"The common law, independently of equity, treats the wife as the separate owner of the land, so far as the inheritance in it is concerned; that does not pass to her husband; and the common law provided a mode by which she might dispose of that which was her separate interest in her land in the lifetime of her husband, namely, by fine or recovery, and not otherwise. For this common-law conveyance the statute substitutes a deed acknowledged. . . . The effect of those words, 'separate use,' is this—they apply to and bar the husband from receiving what, without such words, he would have received, viz. the rents of the property during the life of the wife, and during his tenancy by the curtesy in case he had a child by her. But how can these words 'separate use' add anything to what was her own separately and distinct from her husband; or how can they enable her to dispose of what is her separate property, without such words, in a different way from what she could have done before the statute?" His Honor then observes upon Atchison v. Le Mann, and excused himself from following Adams v. Gamble, which he would have felt bound to do had the Court of Appeal been unanimous; and he concluded by holding that the words of the 77th section of stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, were applicable to an estate in fee-simple of a married woman, though given for her separate use.

We have seen in a very respectable contemporary (7 Sol. Journ. 640) an article upon this decision of the Master of the Rolls, in which a different view is taken from that which we have above expressed. Had the writer made out what he, in effect, there states to be the law—namely, that the whole inheritance of a wife in fee-simple estates is vested in the husband, and that "at the present day the conveyance by the husband of his wife's inheritance at law is an absolute conveyance of the whole inheritance," we should be inclined to say that he had proved his case; but the only argument suggested in support of such a proposition is, that the husband, by feoffment or fine of the wife's estate, could take away the right of entry of the wife or her heir; and from this he argued that the feoffment or fine operated as a conveyance of the legal fee. It is only necessary, in answer to this, to remind our readers that the feoffment or fine in such a case owed its entire effect, not to its conveying a legal estate, but to its tortious effect in creating a new estate, which might be ripened into maturity by non-claim.

In conclusion, we must express a hope that, either in the case of Lechmere v. Broderidge, Adams v. Gamble, or Taylor v. Meads, the stake may be of sufficient amount to carry an appeal to the House of Lords. As in a matter of daily occurrence, it is most desirable that so important a question should be settled by the decision of the highest tribunal.

[It is right that both sides of a question so important as that which is the subject of the above communication should be fairly heard, and we willingly make room for our correspondent's able argument; but we must be permitted to say that we have no doubt as to the propriety of the Lord Chancellor's decision, and principally for the reasons stated by a correspondent in 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 244 (and see p. 277, where "opposite," in the 12th line of the paragraph, should be "apposite").—ED.]

Samuel Horace Clarke Maddock, of 3, Spring-gardens, Westminster, has been appointed to be a commissioner to administer oaths in common law courts, and to take acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women.

PROBATE DUTY PAYABLE IN RESPECT OF LEASEHOLDS ON MORTGAGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Permit me say a few words in reply to your observations on the letter you were kind enough to insert in last week's "JURIST."

When a leasehold estate charged with a mortgage debt is valued as an equity of redemption only, to say the deduction is made, not for a debt, but for a charge, sounds rather like a petitio principii; and if the act does not say that no deduction is to be made for a charge, it does say that no deduction is to be made for a debt.

It is admitted that the sum secured is a debt, but then it is said it is also a charge, as much so as rent is a charge, or the portion in the case put is a charge. Now it is a personal debt, for the payment of which the leasehold is only a security. It is a debt which the mortgagee may require to be paid out of the general assets. It is, when secured by covenant, a debt the executor must pay out of the general assets, before he pays any simple contract debt. Rent, on the contrary, is primarily payable out of the property. It is, so to speak, a part of the thing itself reserved by the lessor, and the covenant to pay it is only a security. So, in the supposed case, the portion is strictly and simply a charge on the leasehold, and the brother is under no personal obligation to pay it. His interest is the difference between the portion and the value of the leasehold, just as the value of his interest would be one-half that of the leasehold, were he and his sister tenants in common. When the portion is paid, it is paid quâ charge, not quâ debt; and there are no words in the act forbidding it being deducted. But the act says expressly debts are not to be deducted.

Again: is it quite accurate to say the debt may be paid out of the property charged or the general assets, at the option of the executor? He cannot compel the mortgagee to take the property in satisfaction of the debt, or any part of it; nor can he discharge the general assets by selling the property subject to the mortgage; nor can he, properly speaking, sell free from the charge, unless he first pays the debt, or makes an arrangement with the mortgagee.

For the purposes of the act, the mortgage, whether legal or equitable, is, I submit, to be regarded as courts of equity regard it; that is, the mortgagee is to be considered as the owner of the debt, and the mortgagor as the owner of the property; the debt being considered the principal, and the land the accessory. An equity of redemption, therefore, is something more than a mere right to take back the property. And if, after the testator's death, the executor pays the debt out of the general assets, he relieves the property of an incumbrance, but does not change the nature of the testator's equitable estate or interest. He takes the leasehold out of pledge, as he might take a picture or other chattel out of pawn, but he does not thereby alter the intrinsic value of that estate or interest of which equity considers the testator died possessed.

[We are not convinced by our learned correspondent's argument; but we do not think we can usefully add to our further remarks, beyond referring to Locke King's Act, which seems to us to conclude the case against the Crown, but which we did not before refer to, because we thought it better to rely on general principles.—ED.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, Feb. 24.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS' COSTS.

The Lord Chancellor, in presenting a bill to amend the law relating to attorneys and solicitors, said—The present principle of remunerating attorneys and solicitors is one which requires amendment, and is one of the instances of the old and absurd practice of the law interfering to regulate the rights of labour, and of determining the manner in which the person employed shall be remunerated. According to the present system, when an attorney is employed by a client, his remuneration is governed by certain fixed rules, from which it is impossible for either party to depart. For instance, supposing a solicitor be employed to collect and distribute the assets of a debtor among his creditors, on the terms of receiving one-sixth of the sums so distributed as his remuneration, such a contract would not be legal, and could not be enforced between the parties. Another objection to the present practice is, that the remuneration is regulated by the quantity of writing required, so that, instead of being remunerated according to the skill, care, time, and labour expended in the conduct of the case, the solicitor is paid by the yard. This practice is most mischievous, as it leads to a great deal of that verbosity and tautology in legal documents which has thrown so much opprobrium upon a numerous body of practitioners. The bill proposes to deal with these defects by a very simple remedy—namely, by allowing the attorney and his client to enter into a contract, specifying the remuneration to be given for the work to be performed. Of course, the bill requires to be looked at with care and attention, and I feel assured that I shall have the assistance of your Lordships, and more especially of my noble and learned friends, in my endeavour to accomplish this great object. It is singular, that until I brought forward my bill last session, no attempt should have been made to remedy the acknowledged and admitted defects I have referred to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday, Feb. 28.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.

Mr. Kimmins moved, that it be an instruction to the select committee on the Courts of Justice Concentration (Site) Bill, that they have power to make provision for appropriating or obtaining sites, and for the erection of lodging-houses or other suitable dwellings for the working classes proposed to be displaced by the said bill. He had no desire to say a word against the admirable measure for the concentration of the law courts. He believed the site was very well adapted to the object, and that the erection of the courts there would open up a neighbourhood which needed improvement. The promoters, however, had been guilty of some neglect towards the poor people who resided in that quarter. A return had been presented to the House of Lords, which gave the number of houses to be pulled down, in order to make way for the courts of law, as 151, and the number of persons displaced as 302. This statement was obviously so absurd, that another return was called for, and this was nearer the mark. From the second return, he learned that the number of houses to be removed would be 151, inhabited by 1812 people. Even this, however, was still less than the actual number, as he was satisfied from having himself visited the spot. He had obtained from Mr. Abraham some trustworthy information on the subject. That gentleman said, that at least 123 dwelling-houses would be destroyed, inhabited by about 3070 persons purely of the labouring class. Moreover, there were lodging-houses in the district, accommodating from 50 to 60 people nightly. One of the city missionaries confirmed these figures as being not at all exaggerated, and probably the number of people displaced would be not less than 4000.

Mr. Cooper said it was impossible to devise a remedy that would not increase the evil. He hoped the motion would not be pressed.

The motion was supported by Mr. Watkin, Mr. Lygon, and Sir F. Goldsmid.

The Attorney-General said, if any one could offer any practical suggestion for remedying this incidental evil, the Government would be ready to consider it; but no one who looked at the matter carefully could doubt, that in the long run the evil would rectify itself, and ultimately benefit the classes displaced. To devise an immediate remedy was totally impracticable.

Mr. Henley spoke in favour of the motion.

Lord Palmerston objected, that the motion would be nugatory, as the committee would have no power to do what was desired.

Mr. Hennessy moved an amendment of the terms of the resolution that would obviate this objection.

Lord Palmerston still objected.

On a division, it appeared that there were not forty members present, so the House adjourned.

Wednesday, March 1.

LAW OF EVIDENCE, &c. BILL.

Sir F. Kelly, in moving the second reading of this bill, said he did not intend to invite any discussion upon it, as it had been agreed that in committee it should receive full consideration. On the proposal to admit the evidence of the accused in criminal cases there was doubtless great difference of opinion. He asked the member for the county of Cork to postpone for the present the further progress of his measure, allowing the committee upon the present bill to stand over till the 23rd March, which would afford ample time for the consideration of the clause.

Mr. Scully consented to do so. It was rather anomalous, he observed, to find Lord Derby's Attorney-General in the foremost rank of law reformers, while the law officers of a liberal Government opposed his efforts. He gave the hon. and learned member opposite credit for being a sincere legal reformer; and he hoped the Attorney-General would likewise become as earnest in this respect as the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, for otherwise his official position would enable him to hinder useful changes. Among all men, and especially lawyers, there was a tendency to cling to familiar ideas, which, from constant daily habit, became stereotyped in their very nature. At one time he, too, held such stereotyped opinions, but when he became a legal reformer the first thing he did was to tear up by the roots all those legal notions imbibed in a long course of years.

The Attorney-General said the House desired to approach all subjects such as the present without anything like party spirit. It was, therefore, with regret he heard it suggested that law reforms should be made a matter of competition between one side of the House and the other. The practical tendency of any change that might be introduced, and whether the administration of justice would be improved or impeded thereby, were the grounds to which the House ought properly to direct its attention. He gave every credit to his honourable and learned friend for the sincerity of his desire to amend the law, and he was confident that on these and other occasions the true course was to do justice to each other's views and intentions. Without anticipating the discussion upon the bill, he might say, that if the measure were confined to the first two and the eighth clauses, there might be very little difference of opinion in relation to them; but as to every one of the others, he felt very considerable doubt. The third clause especially, enabling parties in criminal cases to become witnesses in their own behalf, of course subject to the usual right of cross-examination, seemed to him repugnant to the spirit of our whole legislation. If adopted, it would go far to introduce a system of moral torture like that prevailing in some parts of the continent; and he doubted very much whether innocent persons would be likely to gain so much as his honourable friend hoped, while the system might very possibly operate in favour of the guilty. It was his duty to state that the present views of the Government were opposed to the application; and of course the views of the Government on such a matter were the views of the noble and learned lord, his immediate superior, which were entitled to so much weight. It was very desirable, on a matter of such grave importance, that the opinions of all who were most conversant with the working of the laws in England and Ireland should be obtained; and if it should turn out that before the day mentioned by his honourable and learned friend, the Government were unable to obtain the necessary information from the judges and others whom it was their duty to consult, he felt sure his honourable and learned friend would not oppose any reasonable proposition of adjournment. He also deemed it expedient that the discussion should take its place with the ordinary business of the House, when professional men were released from their engagements.

The bill was then read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on the 22nd inst., the Attorney-General having stated that he would endeavour before that time to make such arrangements as would lead to the discussion upon its clauses being taken when there was likely to be a full House.

The Felony and Misdemeanour Evidence and Practice Bill was read a third time and passed.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE ON THE SABBATH.

Mr. Clifford moved, that in committee of the whole House, the chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a bill for the abolition of fines for non-attendance at a place of Divine worship on Sunday.

The motion was agreed to. The House went into committee, and the resolution was passed.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to confer on the County Courts a limited Jurisdiction in Equity.

[Lord Westbury.]

SECT. 1. Every suit or matter that may now be commenced and prosecuted in the High Court of Chancery may hereafter be brought and prosecuted in the county courts held by virtue of the act of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and the judges thereof shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, subject nevertheless to the provisions and restrictions hereinafter mentioned; that is to say—

- (1). The sum of money or amount demanded or sought to be recovered by the plaintiff in any such suit shall not, exclusive of interest and costs, exceed the sum of 100*l.*, unless it be a distributive or other share of property sought to be divided or distributed:
- (2). The whole estate or property sought to be divided, distributed, dealt with, or administered in any such suit, or whereof it is sought to appoint a new trustee in any such matter, shall not exceed in value the sum of 500*l.*:
- (3). Where such suit seeks a declaration of right to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, the annual value thereof, or, where the same shall not be let, the annual sum at which the same shall be assessed to the relief of the poor, shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.*:
- (4). Where such suit relates to the foreclosure, redemption, or sale of any property in mortgage, the amount of the principal of such mortgage shall not exceed 300*l.*:
- (5). Where the suit relates to the dissolution or winding-up of any partnership, the gross value or amount of the whole property, stock, and credits of such partnership shall not exceed the sum of 500*l.*:
- (6). If the suit relate to the specific performance, or to the delivery up or cancelling, of any agreement for the sale or purchase of any property, the whole amount or value of the property shall not exceed the sum of 300*l.*:
- (7). Injunctions, or orders in the nature of injunctions, if the same are requisite for granting relief in any such suits as aforesaid, may be made by the county courts, and they shall also have power to make orders for the restraint of waste upon lands or tenements the annual value whereof shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.*, and also for stay of proceedings at law where the plaintiff in such proceedings seeks the recovery of a debt provable under a decree for the administration of an estate made by the court to which the application for injunction is made:
- (8). No part of the jurisdiction in lunacy which is now exercised by the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices of the Court of Chancery shall be exercised by any county court:
- (9). The county courts shall have jurisdiction in all matters relating to the guardianship or custody of the person of infants where the annual sum applicable to the maintenance of the infant shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.* per annum.

2. The county courts shall, in addition to the power and authority they now possess, have and exercise, for the purposes of this act, all the power and authority of the High Court of Chancery; and every county court judge, treasurer, registrar, and high bailiff shall discharge, and shall have authority to discharge, all the duties imposed upon him or them by this act, or by any rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided.

3. Whenever it is required that a jury should be summoned for the trial of any matter arising out of the jurisdiction given to the county courts by this act, it shall be summoned from the list of jurors in the possession of the registrar of the county court in which the suit or matter has been brought; and all the enactments relating to the summoning, impanelling, and swearing of a jury in a county court, and to the number of the jury and the unanimity of their verdict, shall apply to every jury summoned under this act; and the duties and obligations of and upon all jurors, suitors, and witnesses, and their liability to penalty and punishment, shall, in any proceeding under this act, be the same as those created, authorised, and imposed by the several statutes now in force relating to county courts.

4. For the due execution of any judgment, decree, or decretal order made under the authority of this act, or of the rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided, the court shall have power to order, and the registrar, upon such order, shall have authority to seal and issue, and the high bailiff to execute, any writ or warrant of possession, writ or warrant of execution, or other process of execution for carrying into effect any judgment, decree, or decretal order of the said court; and such writs, warrants, and processes shall be in the form, and executed at the time and in the manner, to be set forth in the rules and orders to be framed as hereinafter provided.

5. If during the progress of a suit or matter it shall be made to appear to the court that the subject-matter of the suit exceeds the limit in point of amount to which the jurisdiction of the county courts is hereby limited, it shall not affect the validity of any order or decree already made, but it shall be competent for the said court, if it shall think fit, to transfer the suit or matter to the Court of Chancery, and thereupon the suit or matter shall proceed in such one of the Vice-Chancellor's Courts as the Lord Chancellor may by general order direct; and such Vice-Chancellor shall have power to regulate the whole of the procedure in the suit or matter when so transferred: provided always, that if the county court shall deem it expedient that the suit or matter should not be so transferred, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to apply to one of the Vice-Chancellors at chambers for an order authorising and directing the suit or matter to be carried on and prosecuted in the county court, notwithstanding such excess in the amount of the limit to which jurisdiction in the matter is hereby given to the county courts; and the Vice-Chancellor, after hearing the defendant or defendants, if he shall deem it right to summon them to appear before him for that purpose, or on default of the appearance of all or any of them, shall have full power to make such order.

6. With respect to the court in which proceedings in equity shall be taken:—

- (1). Proceedings under this act which relate to the recovery or sale of, or to the restraint of waste on, lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall be taken in that county court within the district of which the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or the greater part thereof, are situate:
- (2). Proceedings under the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, or relating to trustees or trusts, shall be taken in the county court within the district of which the trustees or the cestui que trust, or one of them, respectively, shall have their or his usual place of abode:
- (3). Proceedings for the administration of the assets of a deceased person shall be taken in the county court within the district of which the deceased person at the time of his decease had his usual place of abode:
- (4). Proceedings in partnership cases shall be taken in the county court within the district of which the partnership business was or is carried on:

- (5). Proceedings for the foreclosure, sale, or redemption of property in mortgage shall be taken in the county court within the district of which either the mortgagee or mortgagor has his usual place of abode:
- (6). Proceedings for the specific performance of agreements shall be taken in the county court within the district of which either the person seeking to obtain the specific performance of the agreement, or the person against whom such specific performance is sought to be obtained, resides or carries on business.

7. If during the progress of a suit or matter it shall be made to appear to the court that the suit or matter could be more economically dealt with in some other county court, it shall be competent for the court to transfer the suit or matter to such other county court, and thereupon the suit or matter shall proceed in such other county court.

8. The registrars and high bailiffs of the county courts shall be remunerated for the duties to be performed by them under the jurisdiction in equity given to the courts by this act, by receiving for their own use such fees as may be from time to time authorised to be taken by any orders to be made by the Commissioners of the Treasury, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor; and the Commissioners of the Treasury are hereby authorised and empowered, with such consent as aforesaid, from time to time to make such orders.

9. In addition to the fees to be authorised to be taken by order of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury as aforesaid, there shall be paid by the suitors the several fees which are specified and set forth in the schedule to this act, or such further or other fees as the Lord Chancellor shall from time to time by order direct, which fees shall be received by the registrar of the court, and accounted for and paid over by him to the treasurer of the court, who shall, at such times as the said commissioners shall direct, pay such fees into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Paymaster-General, to be by him carried to an account to be called "The County Court Equitable Jurisdiction Fund Account;" and at the end of every year the said commissioners shall equally divide among the judges of the county courts the fees so received: provided that no judge shall in any one year participate in such fees to any further amount than shall be requisite to raise his existing salary to the sum of 1600*l.* a year; and the surplus of such fees, after each judge shall have been paid the amount necessary to make up his salary to 1600*l.* a year as aforesaid, shall be carried forward from year to year to provide for the payment of such additional salaries in future.

10. Such of the judgments and decrees as may be directed by any rule or order shall be registered with the registrar of county court judgments in London, in such manner as may be therein directed.

11. The county court judges appointed or to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor from time to time to frame rules and orders for regulating the practice of the courts, and forms of proceeding therein, under the 32nd section of an act passed in the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, shall frame the rules and orders for regulating the practice of the county courts under this act, and forms of proceedings therein, and from time to time amend such rules, orders, and forms, and such rules, orders, and forms, or amended rules, orders, and forms, certified under the hands of such judges or of any three or more of them, shall be submitted to the Lord Chancellor, who may allow or disallow or alter the same, and so from time to time; and the rules, orders, and forms, or amended rules, orders, and forms, so allowed or altered, shall, from a day to be named by the Lord Chancellor, be in force in every county court.

12. The county court judges mentioned in the last section shall be empowered to frame a scale of costs and charges to be paid to counsel and attorneys with respect to all proceedings whatever which under any statute may now be taken, or which are herein authorised to be taken, or which may hereafter be authorised to be taken in the county courts, and from time to time to amend such scale; and such scale or amended scale, certified under the hands of such judges or any three or more of them, shall be submitted to the Lord Chancellor, who from time to time may allow or disallow or alter the same; and the scale or amended scale so allowed or altered shall, from a day to be named by the Lord Chancellor, be in force in every county court.

13. If any party in a suit or matter in equity shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of a judge of a county court on any matter of law or equity, or on the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may appeal from the same to one of the Vice-Chancellors, provided that such party shall, within ten days after such determination or direction, give notice of such appeal to the other party or his attorney, and also give security, to be approved by the registrar of the county court, for the costs of the appeal, whatever be the event of the appeal, and for the amount of the judgment, decree, or order, if he be the defendant, and the appeal be dismissed; provided, nevertheless, that such security, so far as regards the amount of the judgment, decree, or order, shall not be required in any case where the judge of the county court shall have ordered the party appealing to pay the amount of such judgment, decree, or order into the hands of the registrar of the county court in which such suit shall have been tried, and the same shall have been paid accordingly, or where the judge shall think it right that an appeal be made without any such security; and the said court of appeal may make such final or other decree or order as it shall think fit, and may also make such order with respect to the costs of the said appeal as such court may think proper; and such orders shall be final: provided that nothing herein contained shall authorise any party to appeal against any decision of a county court, given upon any question as to the annual rent or rateable value, or as to the value of any real or personal property, for the purpose of determining the question of the jurisdiction of the court under this act, nor to appeal against the decision of a county court on the ground that the proceedings might or should have been taken in any other county court.

14. Such appeal shall be in the form of a case agreed on by all parties, or their attorneys; and if they cannot agree, the judge of the county court, upon being applied to by them or their attorneys, shall settle the case, and sign it; and such case shall be transmitted by the appellant to the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs in Chancery.

15. The provisions of this act shall come into operation on the 1st October, 1865, except the provisions relating to framing a scale of costs, and making rules and orders of practice and forms of proceeding, which shall come into operation on the passing of this act.

SIR W. HODGES'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.
* * * The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1863, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 11, 1865.

THE case of Bills and Another, Assignees of Smith v. Smith (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 155), unsettles the notion which most persons entertained on the law of fraudulent preference. The facts were, that the bankrupt had in April, 1862, applied to his brother, the defendant, for a loan. The defendant was unable to lend the money himself, but procured it from his bankers, on the terms, that it should be repaid to them on the 1st July, 1862. The bankrupt was informed by his brother of the terms on which he had procured the money from the bankers, and the bankrupt, without any pressure from his brother, the defendant, repaid him the amount borrowed on the 1st July. The judge directed the jury, that if the bankrupt, though aware that bankruptcy was unavoidable, and though no application had been made for payment, paid the money simply in discharge of an obligation which he had entered into to pay on a given day, without any view of giving any particular creditor a preference at the expense of the rest, the payment would not be a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law. On a motion for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, the Court upheld this direction of the learned judge. Now, we venture to say, that in all the previous cases in which the question of fraudulent preference has been discussed, it has been held, or taken for granted, that there must be pressure on the part of the creditor. In the case of Strachan v. Barton (25 L. J., Ex., 182), Martin, B., thus expresses himself:—"The question of fraudulent preference requires to be correctly stated, for it is one on which no doubt should be allowed to exist, and yet there is no point on which the law has undergone greater changes." Down to 1833, in consequence of the length to which the courts and juries went, the law was in a very unsound and unsatisfactory state, and there was scarcely an act done by a bankrupt which was not overhauled. The first case to put a stop to this state of things was Morgan v. Bundrett (5 B. & Ad. 289). About the same time that that case was decided came the case of Cook v. Rogers (7 Bing. 438). These two cases were the foundation of putting the law in a right position.

In Morgan v. Bundrett, where the bankrupt had deposited plate with a creditor as a security for his debt, the creditor had previously threatened him with an attachment for non-appearance in a Chancery suit, and had repeatedly and urgently pressed him for the money or security. The question for the jury was, whether he deposited the plate in consequence of this pressure; but in the judgments of the several judges it is assumed that pressure was a necessary ingredient. Thus, Littledale, J., says, "I think there was strong evidence to shew that the deposit was made in consequence of pressure." Parke, J., "I think there was much evidence that the deposit was in consequence of pressure." Patteson, J., "Upon the question of pressure, in order to shew that the deposit was made voluntarily, I think it ought to have appeared clearly that the bankrupt took the first step towards making the deposit. Now, there was evidence that he had frequently been asked for payment or security." In Cook v. Rogers it is equally clear that a pressure by the creditor was assumed to be a necessary fact, the question there being, whether the bankrupt was influenced in making the payment by that pressure. Thus, Tindal, C. J., says, "I am not able to perceive any mode of ascertaining whether the payment and the delivery of the bill in this case were such as the law protects, or such as the law avoids, but by putting it to the jury to say whether the payments were made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and under fear of compulsion, or voluntarily." And Alderson, B., "It seems to me that the motives and intentions of the bankrupt may be material or immaterial; or, to speak accurately, may be more or less material, according to his situation, to the nature of the threat, and to the degree and period of urgency by the creditor."

In the case of Van Casteel v. Booker (18 L. J., Ex., 9), the question is fully discussed. There, the judge left it to the jury in such a way as to lead them to suppose, that in order to constitute a fraudulent preference, there must not only be a threat or pressure, but there must be the immediate power of making the pressure available by legal proceedings. The Court held that this last part of the summing up was a misdirection. The Chief Baron observes:—"Any kind of urgency; in short, any threat or act of any sort that prevents the bankrupt being purely a free agent will do." And Parke, B., adds—"Or less than that. If the jury believe that the request had not any effect on the bankrupt's mind, and that the bankrupt meant to give a fraudulent preference, the circumstance of there being a demand goes for nothing. But if the moving cause was the solicitation of the applicant, and not the desire of the bankrupt himself to prevent the distribution of his property, according to the cases that is no fraudulent preference, but that there need not be a present power on his part of proceeding against the bankrupt." In short, we believe in all the cases the pressure or solicitation on the part of the creditor will be found to be a necessary ingredient in the question, and that the doubt has been not whether such external pressure was necessary, but whether it did, in fact, operate on the mind of the bankrupt when he made the payment.

This, then, was the supposed rule of law up to the time of the case of Bills v. Smith, in which it will be remembered that there was no demand or pressure by the creditor. All that he did was to tell the bankrupt in April, when he gave him the money, that he himself had to repay it to the bankers in July; so that all that he told him was at what time the debt would be due; and it was, therefore, no reason, if the near relationship is to be excepted, for the bankrupt's paying this debt rather than any other which he also knew to be due at a given day. Suppose a man to have debts coming due on bills accepted by himself, or under any contract for payment of money at a given day, could it be contended that his payment of one or some of them, in contemplation of bankruptcy, would not be a fraudulent preference? The fact tha he knew it to be due could be no answer, as he must be taken to know the same of all his debts. The near relationship only aggravates the suspicious nature of the payment. The Court repudiates the notion of a demand by the creditor being necessary. "The effect of pressure in legalising payment is only that it rebuts the presumption of an intention on the part of the debtor to act in fraud of the law, from which fraudulent intention alone arises the invalidity of the transaction; but if the fact of pressure by the creditor only operates in the way pointed out, why may not any other circumstances which in like manner would serve to repel the presumption of fraudulent intention be available for this purpose?" Now, if there is not pressure by the creditor, it is difficult to conceive what other circumstances there can be which would influence the debtor. Not affection or friendship for the creditor—for his acting on such feelings would constitute at once a fraudulent preference. If he was a very silly or ignorant person, and thought that the non-payment of the particular debt would subject him to some severe punishment, it must be assumed, from the judgment in Bills v. Smith, that the payment under such a belief would be protected. But such a latitude of investigation opens the door to a variety of questions, on which the verdict of a jury must always be uncertain. They will have to consider, and principally upon the unsatisfactory evidence of the bankrupt himself, what were the motives and mental conditions which induced him to make the payment. If pressure of the creditor were a necessary element in the question, it would be comparatively easy for the jury to form an opinion on the effect of the pressure on his mind, but it is no easy thing to say how far a man's belief or impressions—no external cause being brought to bear upon him—influenced his conduct. The Court observes, "that there is authority for holding that where money is paid under a special contract for repayment made when the money was lent, this act would not amount to a fraudulent preference; and cites as this authority the case of Hunt v. Mortimer (10 B. & Cr. 44); but we must venture to think that the true ground of the judgment in that case is that assigned by Patteson, J., viz. that there had been an equitable assignment by the bankrupts at the time they borrowed the money of the fund, the payment of which to the lender was insisted upon as a fraudulent preference. The money was not lent by the defendant to the bankrupts on their general credit, but on the faith of the moneys which were to be received from the East India Company; and the arrangement between the bankrupts and the defendant had the effect of an equitable assignment of the particular fund to which the plaintiffs, who, as assignees, are entitled only to such effects as the bankrupts had, both legally and equitably, have no claim."

This appears to be the real ground of the judgment in Hunt v. Mortimer, and if it is, the case is not an authority for the judgment in Bills v. Smith, in which case no particular sum was ever assigned by the bankrupt to pay the money which his brother had borrowed for him.

Upon the whole, we think that the decision in Bills v. Smith is a considerable deviation from what has hitherto been supposed to be the law of fraudulent preference, and it has certainly created much surprise in the profession. It was generally thought that upon the previous authorities, pressure by the creditor must be proved. If Bills v. Smith is to be an authority for the future, there is no occasion for such proof, and in all cases where there is no demand or pressure by the creditor, juries will have to determine what were the motives influencing the bankrupt, without the assistance which proof of external causes of a nature likely to act upon his mind would afford them.

Correspondence.

SEPARATE ESTATE IN FEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I have perused an article from a correspondent in your last number, relative to a wife's power of disposition over her separate estate of inheritance, in which remarks are made on an article in the Solicitors' Journal, vol. 7, p. 640, on the same question. It is in your correspondent's communication admitted that the writer of that article would have proved his point, if he could have shewn, that at the common law the whole inheritance of a wife's estate was during the coverture vested in the husband; and that a conveyance by the husband was a conveyance of the inheritance. And your correspondent remarks, that the husband's fine or feoffment in such case owed its entire effect, "not to its conveying a legal estate, but to its creating a new estate" by wrong. Now, to this, I need merely answer, that if the inheritance were not in the husband, he could not discontinue the estate, though he might create a disseisin. The wife, however, was at the common law put to her action, and had no right of entry, which she would have had, if the fine or feoffment had been a mere disseisin, or a forfeiture, as it must have been if the husband's legal estate had been a mere freehold estate for the coverture, i. e. for the joint lives of the husband and wife; in fact, I have but to refer to Littleton's definition of a discontinuance, and Coke's commentary on it, and to the second instance of discontinuance given by Littleton (see Co. Litt., sects. 592, 594), in order to establish my position. And I take leave to remind your correspondent, that discontinuance, which tolled an entry, was different from mere disseisin, which did not, and that to create a discontinuance the inheritance must have been in the discontinor, and not the freehold only.

I remain, Sir,

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE

[Our correspondent has given a sound technical answer to a technical argument. But surely the blazonry of tenure can have no bearing on the construction or effect of a trust, which is intended to set aside the ordinary rules of property. The decision in Lechmere v. Brotheridge, which was overruled in Taylor v. Meads, was rested on two considerations—first, that it is against the policy of the law to allow a settlor, by a mere declaration of intention, to dispense with the machinery of the Fines and Recoveries Act; and, secondly, that the sole intention of the trust for separate use is to exclude marital control. It seems to us, that the decision is left without any support, when it is shewn, by reference to numerous authorities, which we need not cite again—First, that a mere declaration of intention is a sufficient dispensation with the machinery of the act, whether it be in the common form of a power of appointment, or in the very words which the Master of the Rolls uses to express the supposed illegal intention—"I declare that my intention is, that she may dispose of the same without acknowledgment under stat. 3 & 4 Will 4, c. 74." (32 Beav. 364; see pp. 360, 361, where the same judge, in the same case, and in the same judgment, expressly decided, that such a declaration of intention was sufficient):—And, secondly, that, so far from the protection of the wife from marital control being the main object and effect of the trust for separate use, as interpreted and enforced in equity, a further and distinct expression of intention, that the wife shall not have power to alienate her separate property, is necessary for that purpose, without which the trust simply operates to remove the disabilities of coverture, incidentally excluding the marital title, but doing much more than that, by investing the wife with all the powers of disposition which she would have if she were unmarried; and that in respect even of reversionary interests in personalty, which, so far from needing protection from marital control, could not, without the aid of the trust for separate use, be dealt with either by the husband or by the wife, nor by both together.—ED.]

ASSOCIATION OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

THE annual meeting of the delegates from the various provincial Chambers of Commerce constituting this association commenced on Tuesday, the 21st February, at the Westminster Palace Hotel; Mr. Sampson S. Lloyd, the chairman of the association, presiding.

BANKRUPTCY LAW REFORM.

The Chairman moved the following resolutions:—

"That the experience of the commercial community and the evidence taken before the select committee of the House of Commons last session, combine to shew that a thorough reform of the English law of bankruptcy, and of the system of procedure under it, is urgently needed. That in such reform the following are important desiderata:—

"I. Provisions for the safe, economical, and speedy realisation and distribution of the estate. That in the opinion of this meeting, the provisions of the Scottish Law of Bankruptcy (19 & 20 Vict. c. 79), accomplish these objects very satisfactorily, and this meeting approves their adoption in England.

"II. Provisions for the adequate and certain punishment for insolvency arising from the wilful and reckless incurring of debt, to an extent beyond that which the bankrupt had reasonable expectation of discharging, as well as for actually fraudulent bankruptcy. That in reference to this point it is desirable that the acts constituting reckless insolvency and fraudulent bankruptcy should be clearly defined (irrespective of the condition of 'intent' to defraud); and that the definitions of the French Code de Commerce, arts. 585, 586, 591, 593, appear in the main to do this satisfactorily.

"III. The appointment of a chief judge to secure uniformity of decisions, and greater facilities and economy in cases of appeal.

"IV. The administration in the Court of Bankruptcy of the estates of deceased insolvents.

"V. The abolition of the limitation under the 221st section of the act of 1861, by which an offender is only punishable for a misdemeanour if committed within three months prior to bankruptcy.

"VI. The assimilation (as far as practicable) of the statute law of England, Scotland, and Ireland on this subject.

"VII. The provision of means for the recovery of British bankruptcy assets situate in any part of the British empire, and the endeavour (by negotiation or otherwise) to obtain means for the recovery of British bankruptcy assets situate in foreign countries.

"VIII. The abolition of the rule by which secured creditors are permitted to vote for deeds of composition in respect to such part of their claims as is secured.

"IX. The consolidation of the entire statute law on this subject into one act."

Which, after discussion, was put and carried unanimously.

A committee was then appointed to wait upon the Lord Chancellor, and to impress upon him the importance of assimilating the English law of bankruptcy to the law of Scotland.

PARTNERSHIP LAW AMENDMENT.

Mr. Dixon (Birmingham) moved the following resolution:—

"That the meeting is of opinion that it would be advisable to alter the partnership laws, so far as to declare that receiving a share of profits, instead of, or in addition to, a fixed rate of interest, for money lent to a private trading concern, shall not make the lender a partner."

He said the resolution simply declared that it was inexpedient that the law should allow a lender to obtain a fixed rate of interest on a loan without becoming a partner, and yet that he should not be allowed to obtain a variable rate of interest. That was the whole of the difference which he proposed to effect by a change in the law.

Mr. Lupton moved, by way of amendment, that the words, "In the case of money lent, would be liable for the debts of the firm for twelve months after its withdrawal, and the loan must be registered."

The amendment was carried, twenty being for and two against it, six remaining neutral.

The original motion, as amended, was then carried without a division.

Mr. Dixon then moved,—

"That this meeting is of opinion that it would be advisable to alter the partnership laws, so far as to declare that giving a clerk or manager a share of the profits in addition to, or in lieu of, a salary, shall not constitute such clerk or manager a partner."

After a short discussion the resolution was agreed to, the numbers being eighteen for and eight against it.

PETITIONS OF THE BAR IN FAVOUR OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF COURTS OF JUSTICE BILLS.

THE petition to the House of Commons was presented by the Attorney-General on the 23rd February; it was signed in one week by 681 members of the Bar, of whom 306 are members of Lincoln's Inn, 215 of the Inner Temple, 140 of the Middle Temple, 17 of Gray's Inn, and 3 of Serjeant's Inn. Of these twenty-six are Queen's Counsel, and are distributed among the Inns of Court as follows:—Lincoln's Inn, eleven; Inner Temple, six; Middle Temple, five; and Gray's Inn, four.

The signatures include most of the leading juniors of both the common law and equity Bars; indeed, it is believed that almost the entire equity Bar have signed.

Had time permitted, the petition would doubtless have been much more numerous signed by members of the common-law Bar, as the numbers of those who have, for various reasons, declined to sign may safely be estimated at not more than five per cent. of those personally applied to.

The petition to the House of Lords still lies for signature in the libraries of the Inner and Middle Temples and of Lincoln's Inn.

COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION BILL.

The Lord Chancellor having moved the second reading of this bill,

Lord St. Leonards said, that when on a former occasion, a somewhat similar bill was brought in to give the courts of common law an equitable jurisdiction, he had taken the liberty of pointing out to their Lordships several serious objections to it, and not the least among them was, that the judges to whom it was proposed to extend the jurisdiction were not the class of lawyers to deal with that kind of law. This he said without any impeachment of their learning, as the two branches of the law were totally distinct. The second ground on which he had objected to that bill was, that the common-law courts had not the machinery necessary for work satisfactorily an equitable jurisdiction; and, thirdly, that they had not the time to perform such extra duties. A committee consisting of most of the principal members of the Legislature was appointed to consider the bill, and the result was that clause after clause was struck out, and eventually the noble Lord who introduced the bill allowed it to drop, and nothing more was heard of the subject until the noble Lord upon the woolsack introduced his bill last year, of which the present was a portion. The first objection he made to the original bill applied with ten times the force to the present bill, because their Lordships must be well aware that the county court judges must be incompetent as lawyers to deal with questions in equity. They had studied the law as common-law lawyers, and were very well adapted for the positions they held, but they had never in their lives ventured to give an opinion upon a case involving equity law, which they did not assume or pretend to understand. The bill sought to force a jurisdiction upon a class of judges who did not desire it, and would, if asked for their opinion, pray to be delivered from it. Those judges were not to blame for wishing to avoid the novel jurisdiction, as when they accepted their office there were no duties attached to it that they were not capable of discharging. How could they cast upon the county court judges new duties which they were unequal to perform, and which they had never undertaken? They were about to put their unholy hands upon 1,000,000*l.* belonging to the Suitors' Fee Fund, and 500,000*l.* from a reserve fund, not one single shilling of which they ought to touch, in order to build a palace of justice, into which the rich man would walk, and demand at the hands of competent judges, assisted by a competent bar, a just decision upon his rights. But this bill proposed that the poor man, with his little all of 300*l.* or 500*l.*, should not approach this palace of justice, in all its grandeur, but must go to the county court, and have his rights decided by a person who professed himself to be totally ignorant of that branch of the law.

There would be then truly one law for the rich and another for the poor. With regard to the machinery necessary for properly carrying out equity law, let their Lordships compare that of the county courts with that of the Court of Chancery, and they would at once see the impossibility of reducing to practice the theory of this bill. By the improvements which had been and would be made in the practice of the Chancery Courts, the costs of proceedings therein would be greatly reduced, so that the objection that they were too expensive for the poor man would be removed. If the bill were based upon sympathy for the poor man, it shewed itself in saving his pocket by giving him bad law, which nobody would wish to have at any price. It must not be forgotten, that in the county court there were no equity barristers, and the attorneys who practised there would be incompetent to assist the judge upon any doubtful point. As to the bill now under discussion, a great objection to giving jurisdiction in equity in county courts was, that the judges in these courts were itinerant. They went circuit, and might be forty or fifty miles off when an application was made to their court. A court of equity ought to be fixed; otherwise it could not answer the purpose for which it was intended. A resolution had been sent to him from the Standing Committee of the Jurisprudence Department of the Social Science Association, in which it was declared that the existing machinery of the county courts was not adequate to the exercise of a jurisdiction in equity. He concurred in that view; a suit for 100*l.* might involve some very nice questions, and though the annual value of the property might not exceed 20*l.*, the personal interest which the landlord had in it might be worth many thousands of pounds. Again: there were no more delicate questions than those which had to be decided in a court of equity in suits for specific performance and suits for the cancelling of agreements, and these questions arose irrespectively of the amount involved. The more the bill was examined, the more evident it became that such a measure would not work; if the limits were passed by even the smallest amount the parties might be driven to the Court of Chancery after all. In cases of mortgage, it was to be remembered that the mortgagee and the mortgagor did not usually reside in the same place, and that a man might reside at one end of the kingdom and have his money lent at the other. A mortgagee, for instance, living in the north of England, might step into a county court fifty yards from his door, and take proceedings against his mortgagor who lived in the south. The same was the case with regard to suits for specific performance. He objected strongly to the manner in which the fees were to be levied. The Government were about to take a million from the funds of the Court of Chancery, which he maintained was the property of the suitors, and which ought to be applied to the reduction of the fees, so that even the poorest might be able to avail themselves of the remedies provided by the Court of Chancery. He was strongly opposed to the bill, but on the whole he did not think it advisable to divide the House against it on the present stage.

Lord Cranworth concurred entirely with his noble and learned friend in thinking that there were many provisions in this bill which ought not to be allowed to stand, but upon the whole, a bill to give county courts equitable jurisdiction in cases of small amount, would be exceedingly useful. The creation of county courts was, in the first instance, a tentative measure, but it had succeeded admirably, and from time to time their jurisdiction had been enlarged, to the great benefit of the country. The time had come when this equitable jurisdiction might be conferred upon them. Surely courts which were intrusted with the duty of ascertaining whether debts were due were competent to wind up these small estates, to ascertain who were the creditors, and to divide the assets. By the law as it at present stood, county courts had a jurisdiction as to legacies up to 50*l.*, but they had no jurisdiction where people died intestate, leaving a small property. He agreed with his noble and learned friend's objection to the manner in which the judges were to be paid for the extra labour imposed on them.

Lord Chelmsford said, that it would undoubtedly be a desirable thing, if equitable remedies could be brought within the reach of persons who could not afford the expensive luxury of a Chancery suit. To prevent the county courts, however, obtaining too large a jurisdiction, would require very careful framing of the details of the bill; and he wished to call his noble and learned friend's attention to the wording of the first clause, which he thought might have rather a dangerous effect. The first clause ran thus:—"Every suit or matter that may now be commenced and prosecuted in the High Court of Chancery, may hereafter be brought and prosecuted in the county courts, and the judges shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine the same, &c., subject to the provisions and restrictions hereinafter named." But unless those restrictions were very carefully framed, the county courts would get a jurisdiction to any amount; and he would suggest, that it would be better if the clause ran—"The judges of the county courts shall have power to hear and determine every suit which may now be commenced in the High Court of Chancery in the following cases." He could not help fearing, that if this additional business was thrown upon the county courts, they would be found scarcely able to bear the increased burthen. He had been informed by one of the metropolitan county court judges, that he had had an average of 140 cases every day on which he sat, and that he was frequently occupied until seven or eight in the evening in disposing of them. The only other point to which he would advert upon the present occasion, was the very objectionable mode in which it was proposed to remunerate the judges for the additional labour to be cast upon them. He was inclined to believe, that the plan proposed by the bill did not have the entire concurrence of the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack, but that he had adopted it under the belief, that a proposition for an increase of salary to the judges would meet with opposition elsewhere. The county court judges had not been treated either fairly or liberally by the country. By the provision in the bill, no judge was to receive a greater amount of fees than would raise his whole remuneration to 1800*l.* a year. The effect of that would be, that in populous places, where the greatest proportion of new business might be expected to arise, and where the judges now received 1500*l.*, the only additional remuneration they would receive for the new labour would be 100*l.* a year, while, in districts where there was less business, the judge might get an increase of 400*l.* a year. His own opinion was, that all the judges should receive 1800*l.*, and some of them were well entitled to 1800*l.*

Lord Chancellor.—As to the remuneration of the judges, the noble and learned Lord has rightly divined that the mode I have adopted in the bill is one dictated by necessity, and not by choice. I am perfectly well aware of the objections to this plan. It is one I would not have resorted to if I had found myself able to carry another mode of remuneration. The sum voted in the last year for the county courts generally was 152,000*l.*, and the salaries of the judges, paid out of the Consolidated Fund, amounted to 82,000*l.*; so that the total expense was 234,000*l.* I am by no means disposed to say that is too large an amount; but, at the same time, it is so large a sum that I was very unwilling to peril this measure by proposing that any considerable addition should be made to the salaries of the judges. I was afraid that would involve the discomfiture of the bill, or, at least, that the proposition would not meet with the assent of the House of Commons, so that the judges would be left without additional remuneration for new labours to be imposed upon them. I concur in much that has been said as to the merits of these functionaries, and the inadequate manner in which they are paid. I protested against the reduction of their salaries. I desire to elevate their salaries to an amount of 1800*l.* a year. It was in order to avoid the danger of the bill being utterly defeated that I have now proposed this mode of remuneration, not as the best mode, but as the only one which I think there is any chance of getting the House of Commons to assent to. As to the measure itself, I can only say I am not surprised at the opposition of the noble and learned Lord near me (Lord St. Leonards). I know the great advantage of having his determined opposition, because we are certain to have the benefit of the close scrutiny of all the provisions of the measure. At the same time I hope that his opposition is with a view to amend, and not to destroy, the bill. My noble and learned friend has referred to these judges as being utterly incompetent to administer business in equity. I am sorry to hear that opinion fall from my noble and learned friend, because he has practised in the equity courts, and was present when Lord Lyndhurst was suddenly transferred from the court of common law to the court of equity, which he afterwards adorned for so many years. I never heard that any charge of incapacity was brought against him, and the same thing may be said of a great number of other judges who were transferred without any warning in the same way; and when my noble and learned friend says, I had better abstain from putting sacrilegious hands upon the fund which ought to be applied to the reduction of the fees of the court, he forgets the effect which has attended the reductions already made. From extracts which I hold in my hand, I find that there was a suit instituted in the Court of Chancery to get a decree for some property not exceeding in value 150*l.* The costs amounted to 85*l.* 13*s.*; but the court fees, the reduction of which is the panacea of my noble and learned friend, were only 5*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* The next case is something still worse. That was a small suit instituted for the administration of an estate. The whole estate was 400*l.*, and the debts on it 100*l.* The costs amounted to 130*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*, the court fees being only 9*l.* 12*s.* These expenses arise from the fact, that the suit originates in the country, and the business has to be conducted between country and London solicitors, involving great loss of time and increase of expense. If witnesses be required, these witnesses would also properly have to come to London. The great fault of lawyers is, that they become so enamoured of the old system in which they have been bred, and in its principles, that they refuse to see anything but good in its application, and they look with suspicion on any plan which is likely to make the form of judicial procedure less elaborate and less costly as likely to cause a departure from that exactness in which they believe justice to reside.

The bill was then read a second time.

Tuesday, March 7.

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, March 2.

The Courts of Justice Building Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Monday, March 6.

On the motion of Mr. M. Gibson, a resolution was agreed to, in committee of the whole House, upon which a bill proposed to be introduced for the amendment of the law of partnership should be founded.

Wednesday, March 8.

The Prisons Bill was read a second time, and referred to a select committee.

REGISTRATION OF COUNTY VOTERS.

Mr. Hunt moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the registration of county voters. The object was to remedy a practical grievance. At present, any person on the list of voters for a county or division might send a notice of objection to any other person on the list, assigning no reason for his objection; and the practice was to place some man of straw on the register, who signed any number of objections, which were distributed all over the county, without giving the persons objected to the slightest clue to the ground of objection. In South Lancashire, for instance, in 1862-3, out of 23,140 names on the register, 16,468 were objected to, and 5554 were expunged. In 1863-4, out of 22,390 names on the register, 13,468 were objected to. That statement was quite sufficient to shew that some change was requisite. The bill required that notices of objection should state specifically the grounds of objection; each should be considered separately, and if any objection taken was pronounced frivolous or vexatious, the revising barrister should have power to give costs on that, even if the objector were successful on any other ground. He also proposed that voters should be able to send declarations, made before a magistrate or a Master in Chancery, stating what their qualification was, instead of being compelled to appear in person before the revising barrister.

After a few words from Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson, and Mr. Collins, who approved the objects of the measure, leave was given to bring in the bill, which was afterwards introduced and read a first time.

Mr. Longfield obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the security of the property of married women separated from their husbands in Ireland.

BILLS IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to amend the Law relating to Attorneys and Solicitors.

[Lord Westbury.]

Sect. 1. A contract between an attorney or solicitor and his client respecting his remuneration for any professional services, either past or future, whether the contract be for payment of a gross sum or for payment of any sum or sums to be ascertained according to any principle, rate, or mode differing from the rules which would otherwise regulate the amount of such remuneration, and whether the remuneration contracted for be greater or less than that to which such attorney or solicitor would otherwise be entitled, shall be valid; provided that the validity, construction, and effect of such contract may be determined in any proceeding by motion, petition, or rule in the matter of the attorney or solicitor without suit.

2. That the officer to whom it shall be referred to tax a bill of fees, charges, and disbursements of any attorney or solicitor which has been delivered, sent to, or left with the client in manner required by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, shall have the like power to award interest thereon from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the term of payment, as by the 23rd section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, are given to juries with respect to the debts or sums there mentioned.

3. An attorney or solicitor being trustee or executor shall be entitled, either alone or jointly with his partner or partners (if any), to the payment of professional fees and charges for professional business done by him or his firm in connexion with the duties or powers of the trusteeship or executorship.

4. An attorney or solicitor may take security from his client for his future fees, charges, and disbursements.

5. Interpretation of words.

Abstract of a Bill for the further Amendment of the Law of Evidence, and the Practice in certain Courts of Justice.

[Sir F. Kelly, Mr. Macaulay, and Mr. M'Mahon.]

Sect. 1. Parties to action for breach of promise of marriage to be admissible as witnesses.

2. Parties to any suit instituted in consequence of adultery may offer themselves as witnesses on their own behalf.

3. Any person on trial for treason, felony, or misdemeanour, may offer himself as a witness on his own behalf.

4. Any person charged with offence punishable on summary conviction, may offer himself as a witness on his own behalf.

5. Such persons to be sworn, and subject to cross-examination.

6. On trial for felony or misdemeanour, counsel for prosecution, and prisoner or his counsel, to be allowed to sum up in certain cases.

7. Special juries allowed for the trial of indictments in certain cases.

8. Any court of justice may refer questions of legitimacy, or of right to be considered British subjects, to a jury.

Abstract of a Bill to amend the Law of Libel, and for more effectually securing the Liberty of the Press.

[Sir C. O'Loughlin, Mr. Longfield, and Mr. Hennessy.]

Sect. 1. Without the sanction of the law officer of the Crown, no private prosecutor shall be at liberty to prefer an indictment for any libel, other than a libel published with intent to extort.

2. The defendant on a trial of an indictment or information for libel may offer himself as a witness, and so may the defendant's wife or husband.

3. No proprietor of a newspaper or periodical publication shall be liable to an action for a faithful report of a speech at a public meeting, unless he shall decline to publish a fair reply to the speech complained of.

4. To an action for a published libel it shall be a defence that the defendant believed the libel to be true, and that he published the same for a lawful object, or as a fair comment, unless the libel has caused, or is likely to cause, actual damage to the plaintiff.

5. In all actions for libel the defendant shall be at liberty to pay money into court.

6. In cases where the damages are under 20s., the defendant shall get his costs, and to carry costs for the plaintiff the damages must be over 40s.

7. A speaker at a public meeting may be proceeded against civilly or criminally for defamatory matter spoken by him at such meeting.

8. The privileges of Parliament or other public bodies not to be affected.

9. The truth of a libel may be pleaded in a short form.

10. Act not to extend to Scotland.

Abstract of Juries in Criminal Cases Bill.

[Sir C. O'Loughlin and Mr. Longfield.]

Sect. 1. In a criminal trial a jury shall not separate without leave, but such separation shall not invalidate verdict.

2. If a jury separates without leave, judge may swear a new jury, or continue the trial with the original jury, and may fine the jurors.

3. When a trial lasts more than a day, the judge may either keep together the jury or allow them to separate, and if kept together he may keep them at an hotel or in the court house, and he may send a county jury to an hotel in a city adjoining.

4. Before a jury shall retire to consider their verdict, a judge may, in certain cases, discharge a jury.

5. In certain cases he must certify the cause of discharge to the Chancellor.

6. If a judge becomes unable to continue a trial, the jury shall be discharged.

7. A jury may be ordered refreshment after they have retired to consider their verdict.

8. After a jury has retired they may be discharged in case of necessity.

9. If a jury cannot agree the judge may discharge them.

10. The judge's decision on the discharge of a jury shall be final.

11. After jury discharged, the party accused may be tried again.

12. Construction of words.

13. Act not to extend to Scotland.

A Bill to facilitate the Discharge of Insolvent Debtors in certain Cases.

[Mr. Paull, Mr. Locke, and Mr. M'Mahon.]

Sect. 1. This act shall commence and take effect from and after the 1st September next after the passing hereof: it shall extend and apply to, and the powers hereby conferred shall be exercised by, the presiding judge of every court having power to commit any person to prison upon or by reason of any order or judgment, wherever there shall have been recovered a sum for debt not exceeding 20l., exclusive of costs; and the Lord Chancellor shall have power to direct from time to time, by General Orders, the forms to be used, and the fees to be taken, upon or in respect of proceedings under this act, and the application of such fees.

2. Whenever upon the examination of any person summoned to appear before the judge of any court having the powers of commitment in the last section mentioned, and be examined touching his estate and effects, and means of paying any judgment debt, it shall appear to the judge that such person has not then, nor within a reasonable time is likely to have, any money or property of any kind, and that, taking into consideration his means of earning any money, there is no well-founded expectation of his being able, after providing for the support of his family, to pay and discharge his debts within a reasonable time out of such earnings, the judge may proceed to examine such person touching all his debts, dealings, and transactions; and if he shall be satisfied with such examination shall, if he think fit, make a preliminary order to the effect that upon a day to be therein named, and within two calendar months from the day of the date thereof, he will proceed to make in favour of the person named therein (such person hereinafter called the insolvent) a final order of discharge from the debts and liabilities then due and owing by him, of which he shall disclose the amounts and names of the creditors respectively in the meantime, unless good cause shall be shewn to the contrary.

3. A notice of such preliminary order having been made shall be put up in some conspicuous place, open to the public, in the court house or office of the registrar or clerk of the court, and shall be entered by the registrar or other officer of the court in a book to be kept for that purpose, which shall be open to the inspection of any person professing to be a creditor, or the agent of a creditor, of the insolvent; and the registrar or other officer of the court shall also, at the request of the insolvent, at any time within one month of the date thereof, but not later, unless by leave of the judge, transmit a similar notice by post, to every creditor of the insolvent with whose name and address he shall be supplied.

4. On the day appointed in that behalf, the judge shall proceed to make the final order of discharge, unless good cause be shewn to the contrary; and to such order, if made, the registrar or other officer of the court shall append the name and address of each creditor to whom a copy of the preliminary order shall have been transmitted, unless such creditor, having previously given to the registrar or such other officer, and to the insolvent, at least ten days' notice in writing of his intention so to do, stating in such notice the grounds on which he relies, shall shew cause to the contrary, and the judge shall be of opinion, that, as regards such creditor, the order of discharge should not take effect; but the judge shall have power to refuse the order of discharge altogether, or to adjourn the further examination of the insolvent from time to time, and at any time to rescind the preliminary order or the order of discharge, in whole or in part, upon being satisfied that such order ought not to have been made.

5. The preliminary order shall have the same effect as an order of protection made under the statutes relating to bankruptcy, and the final order of discharge the same effect as the unconditional order of discharge of a bankrupt under such last-mentioned statutes, as to all the debts and liabilities of the insolvent due and owing at the date of the preliminary order to the creditor who issued the judgment summons, and to those creditors whose names are appended to the order of discharge; and any gift, contract, promise, or agreement to or with the creditor, or any one on his behalf, for the withholding or withdrawing of opposition to the making of the final order, shall be void and of no effect.

6. Act not to apply to persons who obtained credit under false pretences, &c.

7. Title of act.

SUITORS' FEE FUND.—The account of the Suitors' Fund for the year ending October, 1864, just laid before Parliament, shews that, owing to the Chancery pensions charged upon the fund having diminished in the course of the year, the payments from the fund were less by 3423*l.* than in the previous year. The sum of 63,768*l.* was carried over as surplus interest to the Suitors' Fee Fund account, leaving a balance of 21,004*l.* cash. The Suitors' Fee Fund account shews receipts in the year, including the above 63,768*l.*, amounting to 175,890*l.*, a larger receipt than in the previous year by 13,846*l.* The increase arose partly from a larger surplus brought over from the Suitors' Fund, partly from a large sum paid in for brokerage, and partly from increased product of Chancery fees. The payment from this Suitors' Fee Fund for expenses of the courts, salaries, and compensations, amounted to 161,990*l.*, about the same sum as in the previous year, leaving 13,900*l.* as the excess of income over expenditure in the year, instead of the previous year's sorry surplus of 356*l.* Adding the 99,252*l.* cash in hand at the beginning of the year, the balance in hand in November, 1864, on the Suitors' Fee Fund account is 'brought up to the respectable sum of 113,152*l.*

SHIPPING LAW.

In 8vo., price 20s. cloth, lettered.

THE SHIPPING LAW MANUAL: a concise Treatise on the Law governing the Interests of Shipowners, Merchants, Masters, Seamen, and other Persons connected with British Ships. Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

PETTY SESSIONS PRACTICE.

STONE'S PRACTICE OF PETTY SESSIONS.

With the Statutes, a List of Summary Convictions, and an Appendix of Forms. Seventh Edition. By THOMAS BELL and LEWIS W. CAVE, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. With a Supplement, bringing the Statutes and Cases up to 1863. 12mo., price 18s. cloth.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editions have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 18, 1865.

No inconsiderable curiosity has naturally been excited with respect to the provisions of the bill lately introduced by Messrs. Ayrton and Collins, for allowing money to be raised by debentures on the security of land; a curiosity, which certainly has not been allayed by an article in a leading daily paper, warning the public, that a grand financial revolution was involved in the bill, but not giving any particulars of the proposed method by which this revolution was to be effected.

The provisions of the bill are shortly as follows:—The act is to be read with the late well-known act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, under which the registry of the titles of land was constituted. The right given by the 70th section of that act to a registered proprietor desirous of mortgaging his land, to have a special land certificate, is extended to him, if desirous of availing himself of the new statute. On this certificate (which it will be recollected contains particulars of the land, the estate of the proprietor, and the incumbrances on it) being obtained, the proprietor may indorse on it a signed and sealed declaration, that his estate in the land is to stand charged with a particular sum of money and interest, payable at the times and place specified; and this declaration is also to contain the powers, conditions, and provisions to which the charge is to be subject. Upon the execution of this declaration, it is to be considered an interest within the 32nd section, and other provisions of the old act; it is to be entered on the record of title; the certificate on which it is indorsed, the title deeds of the estate (with a declaration that this provision has been complied with), and, if the proprietor likes, a valuation of the property on oath are to be deposited in the registry; but neither before or after registration is the declaration to have any further operation on the property than is expressed in the act.

After the registration of the declaration the proprietor may issue debentures in a given form, which debentures are to be for equal sums of money, to be numbered consecutively, and, if desired, to have coupons attached, which may be discharged by payment to the bearer. The registration of a debenture is to relate back to that of the declaration, and to prevail over any title registered since the declaration; but all registered debentures under the same declaration are to be payable without preference. These debentures may be transferred so as to place the transferee in the same position exactly as the transferor. And no debenture or transfer is before registration to have any operation on the property charged. A debenture is to be personal estate; no trust affecting it is to change the land or owner of it, notwithstanding actual notice; and it is to be an investment, within any power or trust, present or future, which requires money to be invested on mortgage or real security. If the registered holder of a debenture fails to receive payment for thirty days, or if there be any other reasonable ground, the proprietor may apply to the Court of Chancery to be allowed to pay the money into court.

If default be made in payment of a debenture after seven days' notice, the registered owner of it may give a second notice of his intending to apply to the Court of Chancery, and, not earlier than fourteen days, or later than three months, may apply to that Court to appoint a liquidator and banker. And when such persons are appointed, the fullest powers are given for the management and sale of the land, and the payment of the incumbrances. This remedy, through the Court of Chancery, is to be the only one to which the debenture owner is to be entitled, against the property charged.

The first thing that strikes one in reading this act, is a difficulty arising on three of its provisions, which are of considerable importance, viz. the provisions, that the registration of a debenture shall relate back to the registration of declaration; that there shall be no priority, by means of registration, between debentures under the same declaration; and that, before registration, the debenture or its transfer is to have no effect on the property charged. What, we presume, is intended, though perhaps not very clearly expressed, is this—that as far as the sum mentioned in the declaration, such sum is to be an incumbrance, for the benefit of all debentures under it, in priority of all later incumbrances, but is to be divided pari passu between such debentures, whatever the date of their registration. Now, in the first place, it is a questionable matter, whether the later incumbrancer should be affected up to the amount of the registered declaration, and not merely to some smaller sum, the aggregate of registered debentures; but, at all events, in the second place, it seems absolutely necessary that there should be some priority between the debentures, or that some distinct power should be given to the registrar to refuse to register, in order to prevent a gross fraud being perpetrated. As the matter stands, there is nothing to prevent a man from issuing debentures to any amount in excess of the sum mentioned in the declaration, and to save the first debenture holders (notwithstanding they have registered immediately) from coming in merely pari passu with the whole of the later ones. It need hardly be pointed out, that unless this be most clearly obviated, the act would be a dead letter, for no one would advance money under such circumstances.

Another thing that strikes one is, whether it is advisable to allow the declaration of charge to contain special powers, conditions, and provisions, according to the fancy of each proprietor, or whether the incumbrance should not always be of an uniform character.

A third matter is, that the forms require that their execution shall be attested by a solicitor. This seems totally needless, and merely to give a loophole for unnecessary expense.

And, lastly, it is a matter worthy of consideration, whether the provisions as to the debentures, being real securities within the meaning of trusts and powers, should be passed in its present form.

Subject to these observations, and to any minor difficulties which may exist, but not have struck us, the act seems to us to be, not only unobjectionable in principle, but fair and politic. It really comes to this, that the promoters of this bill desire that the owners of real property should be able to raise money without the expense and delay of the present system; without (if they provide against the difficulty we have pointed out) making the security on real property less safe. What possible impropriety or danger there can be in this we cannot conceive.

THE PARTNERSHIP BILL.

THE advocates of credit without debt have learned tactics, if not wisdom, from experience. When it was first suggested that traders should be enabled to obtain goods and money on credit without contracting any liability to pay, and without resorting to the machinery of a joint-stock company, the proposal was defended on the ground that contracts ought to be free, and that if one party was willing to borrow and the other to lend on such terms, the law ought not to hinder them. It was not seen that the law as it existed did not interfere with such contracts, but it was seen that, if special facilities were provided for trading on such terms, the possible creditors of such privileged traders would at least be entitled to clear notice of the terms, to be conveyed by registration, and a distinctive addition to the name of the firm. But the commercial morality of the present generation differs from that of the last; and it is now felt, that while it is most desirable that every one should take his chance of gain without incurring any risk of loss, it is most undesirable that those to whom the risk is to be transferred should have any notice of the arrangement. To impose upon persons trading with limited liability the use of a name indicating the fact, is now, as Mr. Arthur Ryland naively confessed, "felt by commercial men to be an awkward requirement!" It is most unfair—so reason the enlightened commercial men of Birmingham—that the law should interfere to prevent men from trading on the understanding that the person to whom credit is given shall not be personally liable to pay; but it would be most awkward, if the law were altered so as to allow of such dealings, to require that the party giving the credit should be aware of the terms on which it is given. Accordingly, when Mr. Scholefield was entrusted with a bill for extending what is called the principle of limited liability to private firms, it was attempted to disarm opposition by providing the measure with machinery for registration in the office of the registrar of joint-stock companies, which was felt to be harmless, because the registrar is not a tattler, and no one invades the privacy of his office; but the awkward requirement of a really public notice, in the shape of a distinctive addition to the name, was carefully avoided; and when Mr. T. Baring succeeded in carrying an amendment, requiring every partnership trading with limited liability to add the word "registered" to its name, Mr. Scholefield was with difficulty persuaded to proceed with his bill so deformed. It was ultimately dropped, and we now see why. Registration per se, it is admitted, would be useless. Let us, then, have no registration. If the firm is not registered, no one can demand that it shall be described as "registered." Let the secret of its peculiar constitution be confided exclusively to those whom it most concerns—the partners themselves. Let us enact a general rule, without the incumbrance of useless exceptions and details. So, a new bill is framed, dealing with rules of law only, providing no machinery or checks of any kind; and in order to avoid inconvenient references to past attempts, the former promoters of this great reform retire, and the new bill is brought in by Messrs. Dodson, Milner Gibson, and Hutt.

They propose to enact these rules:—

1. A contract to receive a share of the profits of a business, in consideration of a loan, shall not make the lender liable as a partner.

2. Money lent on such a contract shall not, in case of death or bankruptcy, be recovered in competition with other debts.

3. A person in the character of servant or agent in a business may receive, or be entitled to receive, a share of the profits, without being liable as a partner.

4. The widow or child of a deceased partner may receive a share of the profits of a business carried on by the surviving partner, without being liable as a partner.

That is the whole of the bill; simple as it is, it does not, perhaps, quite satisfy its promoters. It will not work without a dummy. But dummies are abundant and cheap. The following example will illustrate the use of them:—A. and B. the principals, and C. the dummy, carry on business under the firm of C. & Co. (for the use of A.'s name or B.'s name would involve a responsibility, against which the bill does not provide); A. is called "manager" or "head clerk," with a fixed yearly salary, in respect of any arrears of which he may compete with the creditors of the firm, and also a right to receive nine-twentieths of the profits. B. lends the capital, for which he receives one-half of the profits; and C. takes down the shutters, with a nominal right to receive the remaining twentieth of the profits, and a real liability to be kicked out, if he claims more than his porter's wages of 20s. a week.

It is scarcely necessary to point out defects of detail in a bill which has no other than a vicious object; but we may notice, in illustration of the difficulty of altering any well-founded rule of the common law, that the measure, by abolishing the significance of the main element and test of partnership liability,—the right to share in profits,—would give undue importance to those hitherto subordinate indications or tests of partnership interest, with which the bill does not meddle. When participating in profits is no longer partnership, i. e. participation in profits (for so with equal contempt of language, logic, and expediency, it is proposed to enact), what real or apparent interference in the business will be sufficient to induce partnership liability? How is a creditor, who, if he were told plainly, that Mr. B. participates in the profits, would not be entitled thence to infer B.'s partnership, to infer it from acts which are now, as it were, secondary evidence of partnership only because they imply a right to profit? The firm is A.; B. takes his profits in A.'s name; the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. Will B. make himself liable by interfering in the conduct of the business? Perhaps yes, if he does not call himself servant or agent; certainly no, if he so calls himself: the bill contains a clause expressly to that effect. So that B. may furnish all the capital, and be the sole manager of the business, and take substantially all the profits, if he only uses A.'s name, or any other name than his own, and gives A. a right, which may or may not be enforced, or may be neutralised by any one of a thousand devices, to the smallest conceivable fraction of the profits. Everything will depend upon the terms, whether written or merely spoken, in which A. and B. make their secret agreement.

The plain rule of the common law, that a debt is the debt of the person who induces the credit, and therefore, in commercial transactions, the sole end of which is profit, is the debt of the person or persons seeking the profit, is the only conceivable rule on the subject, and can never be tampered with without corrupting mercantile morality, and introducing endless uncertainty and contradiction into the law.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, March 9.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The Lord Chancellor said he proposed to lay upon the table of the House a bill which he regarded as one of very great importance. Its object was to abolish imprisonment for debt, or rather so much of it as still continued in operation. Their Lordships were aware that the Act for the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy, which had been passed two or three years back, contained a provision empowering the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy to visit prisons, and to adjudge bankrupt those whom they found imprisoned there for debt. The result of that provision had been most beneficial, and one of its immediate effects was, that the Queen's Bench Prison was closed; nor had any one complained that the remedy of the bona fide creditor had, in consequence of the operation of the measure, been abridged. That being so, it was ascertained by the returns on the subject, that those who were now in prison for debt generally consisted of persons who found their way there for the purpose of being discharged under the bankruptcy law, and the consequence was, that there was a great number of applications for discharge. He thought, therefore, that their Lordships would be justified in taking one step further; for it appeared to him, and it was the general opinion throughout Europe, that the old practice of imprisoning a debtor, merely on account of a debt not being paid, was neither quite just or expedient. Their Lordships were probably aware that there was a committee now sitting for the purpose of inquiring into the whole of the bankrupt law, and it was probable that the report of that committee might be made at no very distant period. From what, however, he had been able to gather of the probable contents of their report, it was likely that a very considerable time would be required for the preparation of a bill to carry its recommendations into effect. He did not under those circumstances anticipate that Parliament would be in a position to legislate upon the ground of the report during the present session, and he therefore proposed by the present bill to make an enactment which he had reason to believe would be in perfect harmony with the recommendations of the committee. This proposal was, that no order of discharge granted to a debtor should have the effect of releasing his future goods unless he paid a dividend of at least 5s. in the pound under the Bankruptcy Act. The present state of the law was, that every man who was brought up for discharge as a bankrupt was in a better condition if he had no property at all than if he had some; for if he had no property, and set his estate down at nil, no one opposed him, and he got his discharge as a matter of course. I propose that no discharge shall avail to release the future property of a bankrupt unless he pays a dividend of 5s. in the pound, or obtains the assent to his discharge of five-sixths of his creditors in point of value. There will be no hardship in discriminating between the honest and fraudulent bankrupt, and, in imposing this condition upon the order of discharge, by which future property will be released from liability, I hope your Lordships will give the bill a first reading.

Lord Chelmsford inquired whether the bill would take away from the judges of county courts the power to commit in default of satisfaction of judgment.

The Lord Chancellor said that the bill entirely reserved the existing county court system.

The bill was then read a first time.

The Dublin South Suburban Railway Bill was read a second time.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS' BILL.

The Lord Chancellor moved that this bill should be read a second time.

Lord St. Leonards said, that the first clause of the bill gave to every attorney the power of making a bargain with his client at any time as to the sum for which he would conduct a particular business, although that sum should be in direct violation of the Orders of the Court fixing the amount of attorneys' fees in every particular instance. The same clause gave to an attorney interest from the time of demand. The third provided, that an attorney who was executor or administrator might act as attorney to the estate, and charge his fees as such; and the last clause provided, that an attorney or solicitor might take from his client security for future costs; such a thing as that had never been permitted by the Courts of England, and ought not to be allowed; because, if an attorney could obtain security for future costs, he would be utterly reckless, and need not care in what litigation he involved his client. He would shew their Lordships what had been the settled practice of the courts of law and equity as to the relation between attorneys and solicitors and their clients. Lord Harwicke, in a case which was reported in 2 Atk. 27, said, that since the passing of the act for taxing attorneys' costs, 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, solicitors had been considered as officers of justice, stated fees had been allowed to them; and in all the courts, more especially in courts of law, certain rules had been laid down to regulate their behaviour to their clients. Lord Loughborough and Lord Eldon had also laid it down as a well-known principle of law, that under any circumstances, the charges of an attorney were taxable; and even in cases where he might have already obtained payment, the Court would interfere if there was any ground for suspecting the existence of any overcharge or fraud on his part. He had quoted these authorities to shew that the law had always regarded transactions between attorneys and their clients as resting upon a totally different foundation to that of ordinary transactions. Supposing, for instance, an attorney were to purchase his client's estate, it would scarcely be possible for him to maintain such purchase in equity, notwithstanding the value of the property were well ascertained, and the client had the advice of a second attorney. The whole system was well devised for protecting the client from the possible improper conduct of the attorney. It would be far from pleasant to him who had had to deal for so many years with attorneys, to speak of them with disrespect as a class, and he distinctly disclaimed any such intention; still, there were persons in that profession who might endeavour to take advantage of any bill giving them uncontrolled power over their clients. As the law now stood, an attorney could make no bargain with his client for any given sum for his services. The law from the earliest period had provided for the taxation of the costs of attorneys, and the costs which they were entitled to charge had been most accurately determined. From the time of the 3 James I down to the present day, bills had been introduced to regulate the costs of attorneys, but in every case they contained most stringent provisions against the attorney, and always subjected his charges to taxation. In 1843, by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, all the laws upon this subject were consolidated, simplified, and amended. One of the most material provisions of the bill was contained in the 37th section, which enacted, that no attorney or solicitor should be entitled to commence an action for fees until the expiration of one month after the delivery of his bill, or until it was duly taxed. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 102, provided six Taxing Masters, with a salary of 2000*l.* per annum each, and certain returns shewed that the expenses of the Taxing Masters' offices amounted to 16,000*l.* or 17,000*l.* per annum. The proposed bill was intended to strike at the root of all these laws, and to render the office of the Taxing Master utterly useless and nugatory. It overruled the general practice, and practically repealed all former acts of Parliament upon the subject, by rendering it lawful for every attorney and solicitor to enter into a contract with his client regulating the amount of his remuneration. There was a rather extraordinary case shewing what the effect was of a man making an agreement with his client for work done. It was that of Mr. Kennedy, a barrister, who admittedly had carried the case of his client through a long litigation with great tact, judgment, and nerve. He thought that, as a barrister, he was entitled to make a bargain with his client, and accordingly he did make a bargain with her that he was to receive 20,000*l.* for his services in the suit. The lady did what ladies sometimes would do—changed her mind, and refused to pay the money. Mr. Kennedy, thinking that law was on his side, went to every Court in Westminster-hall; but all the Courts decided what they ought to have decided—that he was not entitled to recover a single shilling; so that all his ability had been successfully employed for his client without any remuneration for himself. Was Parliament now to enable attorneys to do what barristers could not do? Would their Lordships enable attorneys to do that which, from the nature of things, ought not to be done? Coming to another portion of his noble and learned friend's measure, he had to observe that in the bill of last year his noble and learned friend proposed that if, of two trustees or executors, one, being an attorney, proposed to commence a suit, he would not be entitled to his fees as an attorney unless he had obtained the consent of the other trustee or executor to the suit being instituted; but under the bill now before their Lordships an attorney in such a position was not required to obtain the consent of his co-trustee nor of his cestui que trust, so that his first act might be to institute a suit against himself. The bill would do as much damage to the client as to the solicitor whom it was meant to benefit, and it would make the relations between them much less amicable and confidential than they formerly were.

The Lord Chancellor said, his noble and learned friend complained of this bill on two grounds—first, that it altered the law, which was perfectly true; and next that it was a law of great antiquity. That complaint, too, was true, for this law, which partook of the error and absurdity of ancient laws, was practically the last relic which remained in our institutions of the attempt by law to regulate the remuneration of persons employed in any trade, calling, or profession. Any man employing a surveyor, architect, or engineer was enabled to enter into a contract with him as to the remuneration which he should receive, but the solicitor and client were debarred from making any such contract. The first evil attendant on this state of things was, that a client, when he employed a solicitor, never knew to what amount of liability he was subjecting himself. If a man wished to sell an estate, and for that purpose applied to an auctioneer or agent, he would learn at once the commission he would be charged; but if he employed a solicitor he would have no means of knowing what the amount of his bill of costs would be. He contended, therefore, that it was impolitic to maintain a restriction which prevented solicitors and clients from entering into arrangements which would meet the interests of both parties. The present mode of remuneration was really productive of injury to both parties. The solicitor derived a benefit from delay and procrastination, which were injurious to the client. The longer the time employed in performing the business, the greater would be the solicitor's remuneration. If the parties were allowed to agree upon a certain amount of charge, there would be a pressure upon the solicitor to expedite the business, that he might the sooner receive what was due to him. The great evil of the present system was, that the solicitor, in common justice to himself, was compelled to devise a mode of remuneration most injurious to the client, while, at the same time, it was not sufficiently beneficial to himself. It was this great vice, this old folly, which the noble and learned Lord sought to maintain. The attorney was paid for every instrument which he prepared according to its length, and not according to its value. What was the consequence? Deeds swollen by redundant words, by a vast amount of useless verbosity, until the sense was obscured, and the truth hardly discernible, offering great facilities for obscurity, error, and uncertainty. A deed which at present consists of 100 folios of 72 words each, might with advantage be condensed into 20 folios. But in such a case the attorney, being paid according to the length of the deed, would only receive one-fifth of his proper remuneration, so that he was compelled to adhere to a practice which he knew to be injurious, merely because the law prescribed to him only that mode of remuneration. His noble and learned friend had said that very great evils would arise from placing attorneys in a position to be enabled to contract with their clients; but he (the Lord Chancellor) was at a loss to understand what possible evils could arise from that permission being granted. What harm could there be in allowing an attorney to say to his client who wished to sell an estate, that the charge would not exceed 150*l*.? It must be observed that the bill did not propose to give that power to any but clients who were perfectly competent sui juris, and able to enter into a contract. In all other cases—such as infants or married women—the ordinary bill of costs must still be sent in and be subjected to taxation. But instead of the proposed change being inexpedient, unjust, and mischievous, he believed, that if the profession generally were consulted, they would declare that the present system was inexpedient, unjust, and mischievous, because they are compelled to resort to a mode of remuneration which did not represent that which they ought to have, but which did represent that which they ought not to do. The noble and learned Lord had also spoken of great evils likely to follow from that part of the bill giving to the attorney a right to interest upon the amount of his demand. But that was only a right which was enjoyed by all other persons who were employed to do work for others. A man having done the work, sent in his bill, and demanded payment, and from the time of such demand he was entitled to receive interest as compensation for the money which was detained from him. In the case of an attorney that was not so; but it was difficult to see why a different rule should prevail against him. The attorney, in many cases, was obliged to disburse large sums during the progress of the business; and when the business was completed it was only fair that he should receive payment, or be allowed to charge interest. His noble and learned friend also complained that it was unjust to give to an attorney power to take from his client security for costs; but if there was one point of the bill which he (the Lord Chancellor) thought would be more beneficial than another, it was that very power. That a rule existed forbidding attorneys from taking security for costs had been regretted by many judges. The bill did not propose to interfere with the law as it stood with relation to what was called champerty and maintenance; but there were many cases in which a man was unable to recover what was due to him, and it was proposed to allow him to give security for costs upon the amount he might recover. The object was to offer facility to the obtaining of justice, and to take away an impediment which now deprived many men, who had no other means of recovering it, of property due to them. His noble and learned friend had made other objections, and some of them referred to a clause which, indeed, was open to some question—the clause which provided that professional trustees should be at liberty to act as solicitors, and to be remunerated for so doing. For his own part he should have preferred the clause as it stood in the bill of last year; but that had not been the general feeling of the profession, and in deference to that feeling he had brought forward the clause in its present shape. The clause, however, would prevent much mischief from arising in cases where the remuneration of a solicitor trustee was not provided for. It constantly happened, that a testator had great confidence in a particular solicitor, or firm of solicitors, and therefore selected that solicitor, or one of the firm, to be one of his trustees, in order that his estate might have the benefit of the prudence, skill, and knowledge of the individual selected. But then the law stepped in, and said, that as the testator had neglected to direct that the individual selected as trustee should act as solicitor, and be remunerated as such, therefore the person so acting could not receive any remuneration. That really was a very inconvenient rule, and he had known many cases of hardship, where gentlemen, after devoting their time and attention to the winding up of a testator's affairs, ultimately found themselves deprived of all remuneration for their labours. If some power could be placed in the hands of the solicitors by which they would be authorised in entering into arrangements with their clients, he believed that the result would tend to the advantage, not only of the clients, but also of the profession itself; for he knew nothing which had done more harm to the profession of the law, as a science, than the objectionable method in which attorneys had been remunerated. The present system induced long fees. These, in their turn, led to long abstracts, entailing infinite expense in all transactions with regard to real property, and more particularly in the case of unregistered estates. He invited their Lordships, therefore, to accede to the principles of the bill, though there might be several particulars in the measure itself deserving attention and care.

Lord Chelmsford fully agreed with his noble and learned friend who had first addressed their Lordships, that the bill was vicious in principle. He fully concurred in the opinion, also, that the present mode of remunerating solicitors for what was called conveyancing business was objectionable. In alluding, however, to the "verbosity and redundancy of deeds," he believed his noble and learned friend had mistaken the effect for the cause, because it was not until 1843 that there was any power instituted for taxing attorneys' bills upon conveyancing business. It was not, therefore, until 1843 that the present objectionable scale was introduced; but his noble and learned friend knew, that long before that period, leases, settlements, and conveyances had assumed all the verbosity of their present form. He believed that the prolixity of deeds arose from the fact, that the practice had been in use for many years; that it had undergone the test of judicial criticism; and that clients were generally afraid of departing from the usual custom, lest they should by so doing incur the chance of a flaw in their deeds. His noble and learned friend had justly complained of the present objectionable mode of remunerating solicitors by folios, and the number of words in each folio, but in his bill he proposed still to retain that system, except in cases where an attorney was willing to enter into an agreement with a client. He, however, regarded the client as a person who ought to be protected from the attorney. In entering into an agreement with a solicitor, the client could not be expected to know what would be a fair remuneration for a solicitor's labour. The solicitor, on the other hand, knew perfectly well what he was entitled to, and would take care in his agreement to realise as much as he would have been enabled to charge under the old system. He understood that in Scotland attorneys were remunerated in conveyancing business according to the value of the property; and some such system might, he thought, be introduced into this country. Of course, the per-centage upon a large property would not be the same as upon a small one. The method would, however, be much better than the one at present in use. He quite agreed in the opinion, that attorneys, as a rule, were not likely to enter into any agreements which would be unfair. As a body, they were as honourable as any other profession. Still, all were not so; and protection ought to be afforded by the law, in order to prevent a client falling into the hands of those solicitors who were not respectable, and who would be likely to take advantage of their clients. His noble and learned friend on the woolsack had described the existing arrangement as an ancient barbarism. He could only say it was a provision made by the Legislature for the protection of one of the parties concerned against the undue influence which the other might exercise over him. In the reign of James I, an act was passed to repress the misdemeanours of attorneys and solicitors, and to prevent unnecessary suits and charges. It was enacted by that statute that no solicitor or attorney should be allowed any fees alleged to have been paid to counsel, unless he was able to exhibit a receipt signed by the barrister in question. It was also provided, that no fees should be recovered by an attorney from any of his clients until the former had submitted a detailed bill of fees. From 1605 down to 1799 there was no inherent power in the courts of law to tax the bills of solicitors, although, no doubt, they exercised some sort of control over them. In 1799 a power of taxation was created over the accounts of agents in suits at law, and it was declared that all attorneys and solicitors should be bound to produce their accounts for taxation, and that if a sixpence were struck off, the attorney should pay all the costs of taxation. That system continued down to 1843, and worked so well, that in that year conveyancing and all other business was brought under the operation of the rule. The present measure would deprive clients of that protection, and he thought this was to be regretted. He might remind their Lordships that there were two kinds of costs—the costs between party and party, which the loser was obliged to pay, and the costs between client and attorney, which were taxed, but which each party had to pay for himself. The present bill, however, would deprive the client of the protection of taxation in regard to the costs he owed to his agent, apart from those which were recognised between party and party by the courts of law.

Lord Cranworth said, that the principle of the bill was to leave clients and attorneys to settle the charges between themselves; and that principle, in his opinion, was so sensible and convenient, that he held the burthen of argument lay with those who sought to deviate from it. There was a great distinction between contentious and conveyancing business. He doubted whether taxation had done much good in checking the length and tediousness of conveyancing transactions; and he did not know that the bill would have much effect in that direction, but was at least a right step. It should be borne in mind, that the case of conveyances was one in which the attorney would have always to deal with educated persons, who might be presumed to be able to take care of their own interests; but then the case of contentious litigation was altogether different, and, so far as that was concerned, he entirely concurred in what had fallen from his hon. friend opposite. In that case, the costs which the losing party would have to pay were duly fixed by the Court; and if, by means of any previous contract, the attorney was able to get more than the amount so fixed, an injury would thus far be inflicted on his client. He was, therefore, of opinion that great difficulties would be the result, if the House were to depart from the salutary rule, that costs in contentious cases should be taxed and fixed by the Court. He also objected to the proposal, that a trustee, being an attorney, should be able to charge his own costs; for if there was any one principle better established in equity than another, it was, that no man having a fiduciary duty to perform should be able to place himself in a situation in which the obligation upon him to cut down expense should be in conflict with his interest to increase it. He did not, he might add, see the remotest reason why a solicitor should not be enabled to take security for costs; but although he thought the bill, as a whole, was of sufficient importance to entitle it to a second reading, he was of opinion that it would require considerable modification in committee.

The House then divided:—

LAW OF PATENTS.

In answer to Mr. Hübner,

The Attorney-General said it was the intention of the Government to introduce a bill founded on some of the recommendations of the Commission for inquiring into the working of the Patent Law.

Wednesday, March 15.

JURIES IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

Sir C. O'Loughlin, in moving the second reading of this bill, said it might be described as a chapter of the proposed digest of the unwritten law. It used to be supposed that juries in criminal cases could not, under any circumstances, be discharged without giving a verdict. The judges had, however, taken upon themselves the right of discharging juries when they could not agree upon their verdict, and after they had been locked up a sufficient time. In the case of Reg. v. Charlesworth, the Lord Chief Justice said that the law was in so unsatisfactory a condition that he had not been able to make up his mind on the subject. The question seemed, therefore, to be one for legislation, and he had endeavoured to declare in one short bill the law on the subject of discharging juries. He proposed to authorise the judges to order refreshments to be given to the jury. At present when they were locked up to decide upon a criminal case, they were kept without food, drink, or fuel. This was a relic of a barbarous law which more than one judge had declared ought to be got rid of. The 1st clause declared that in a criminal trial a jury should not separate without leave, but that such separation should not invalidate their verdict. The 2nd clause enacted that if a jury in a criminal case separated without leave, the judge might either swear a new jury or continue the trial with the original jury, and might fine the jurymen. According to the present state of the law, a jury might be allowed to separate if the trial lasted for more than one day in cases of misdemeanour, but not of felony. Under the 4th and 5th clauses, questions might arise which the House might scarcely wish to sanction; for instance, whether the judge ought to have the power to discharge a jury, when once sworn, before they had retired to consider their verdict. He admitted that such a power was liable to abuse, and in political cases it had been abused; when, for example, Chief Justice Scroggs discharged the jury in order to enable the Crown to get up a better case against the prisoners. He would not contend for such a power, but he was prepared to submit the question to the House, whether it was proper that the judges should have it. In the case of Reg. v. Charlesworth, the judges decided that they had the power, but that it ought not to be exercised without strong reasons. The 6th clause met the case of a judge being unable to continue the trial, when he should propose that the jury should be discharged. The other clauses provided, that after a jury had retired they might be discharged in case of the illness of one of the jurors; that, in case of disagreement, the judge might discharge them if he thought fit after they had been kept together for a reasonable time; that there should be no appeal from the decision of the judge; and that in all cases where the jurors had been discharged the trial might take place again.

The Solicitor-General said, the hon. and learned gentleman had spoken of the bill as a digest, but he begged to say it was not; because a digest of the law relating to jurors would have to deal with their qualifications, the mode of summoning juries, and a number of other questions of great importance, upon which the bill did not touch. With respect to so much of the bill as was declaratory, no doubt, where the law was settled, the multiplication of acts of Parliament was mischievous. Now, there were many cases contemplated in this bill, with regard to which declarations were not at all required. They did not want a declaration that a judge had power to fine jurors, or that jurors might be discharged in cases of illness; or that if a jury could not agree the judge might discharge them; or that where a jury was discharged the trial should be held to be null and void. All these declarations were quite unnecessary, and therefore mischievous. But with respect to those portions of the bill which were not declaratory, there were some serious objections. The Secretary for the Home Department had thought it his duty to consult the Chief Justices with regard to the provisions of the bill, and they were both opposed to them. There was one provision which might possibly be salutary—namely, that contained in the 7th clause, to the effect, that after a jury in a criminal case should have retired to consider their verdict, it should be lawful for the judge to order them reasonable refreshment. If that provision were adopted in civil as well as criminal cases, it would be salutary; and he thought that his hon. and learned friend would be well advised to withdraw this bill, and confine his attention to a measure which should embody that provision. The bill would give the judge power to allow the jury to separate in cases of felony or treason which should last more than one day. He was not quite certain that it would be desirable to entrust the judges with that power. And clause 4 raised a very grave constitutional question; for it was to this effect—that after a party was given in charge to a jury, and before the jury had retired to consider their verdict, it should be lawful for the judge to discharge the jury if he was of opinion that a case of sufficient necessity had arisen, or deemed it right for purposes of justice. Now, that was a power which he thought it would be unwise to give. There had been times when judges had been under the influence of the Crown, and in which that power had been exercised to the injury of the subject. Chief Justice Scroggs, in order to give the Crown an opportunity of getting up a better case against Sir J. Fenwick and Mr. Whitbread, had discharged the jury, and those gentlemen were found guilty upon a second trial. That was a power which had been disapproved by Lord Coke and other eminent judges. In the case of Reg. v. Charsenorth, to which his hon. and learned friend had alluded, a witness did not appear, and Mr. Justice Hill, thinking that he had been tampered with, took upon himself to discharge the jury. The case came subsequently before the Court of Queen's Bench, and his hon. and learned friend was not correct in saying that the judges decided that they possessed the power. The sole question decided was, that the jury having been discharged, rightly or wrongly, the defendant could not say that he had been acquitted. Two of the judges thought it clearly wrong to discharge the jury; another thought it was right, and another doubted.

Mr. D. Griffith hoped, as the Solicitor-General was willing that reasonable refreshment should be given to jurors, that the question of remuneration for them would be also favourably considered.

Mr. Longfield thought that his hon. and learned friend had no option but to withdraw the bill, though there was no doubt that some amendment of the law was required.

The bill was then, by leave, withdrawn.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to amend the Law of Partnership.

[Mr. Dodson, Mr. Milner Gibson, and Mr. Hutt.]

Sect. 1. The advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged or about to engage in any trade upon a contract with such person, that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or shall receive a share of the profits, or bear a share of the loss arising from carrying on such trade or undertaking, shall not, of itself, constitute the lender a partner with the person or the persons carrying on such trade, or render him responsible as such.

2. In the event of any such trader as aforesaid being adjudged a bankrupt, or dying in insolvent circumstances, the lender of any such loan as aforesaid shall not be entitled to receive any portion of his principal, or of the profits or interest payable in respect of such loan, until the claims of the other creditors of the said trader for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied.

3. No contract for the remuneration of a servant or agent of any person engaged in any trade or undertaking by a share of the profits of such trade or undertaking, shall, of itself, render such servant or agent responsible as a partner therein.

4. No person being the widow or child of the deceased partner of a trader, and receiving by way of annuity a portion of the profits made by such trader in his business, shall, by reason only of such receipt, be deemed to be a partner or to be subject to any liabilities incurred by such trader.

5. In the construction of this act the word "person" shall include a partnership firm, a joint-stock company, and a corporation.

NINE-TENTHS of the Total Profits are divided among the Assured. Considerably more than one-tenth of the Profits is derived from Policies which do not participate in the Profits, so that THE ASSURED HAVE LARGER BONUSSES THAN IF THEY FORMED A MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY, and received the whole of the Profits derived from their own Policies.

The last BONUS averaged about SIXTY PER CENT. on the Premiums paid, and TWO PER CENT. PER ANNUM on the Sums assured.

THE EXPENSES of Management are less than FIVE PER CENT. on the Income.

THE PREMIUMS are calculated for every half-year of age.

LAW REPORTING.—The Council of Law Reporting having issued an Address to both branches of the Legal Profession, inviting subscriptions to their scheme, it may fairly be assumed that there is a probability of that scheme being carried out. The Editor of "Notanda" is therefore desirous of stating to his Subscribers and the Profession generally what alteration this scheme, if carried out, will make in the "Notanda." According to the scheme, the proposed Reports are to come out in monthly parts. The Editor of "Notanda," therefore, intends to note every Case reported in those Reports from them and all other Cases of the least importance from any other continuing series of Reports. By this means those Gentlemen who may take the proposed new series will have not only complete and ready Notes of Cases in the new series, but also be kept au courant with many Cases not therein reported; and those Gentlemen who may not take the new series will be able to give the proper references to the Cases in the new series, which it is thought will be a great convenience, particularly for country practitioners.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MARCH 25, 1865.

THE Wills Act was founded on the recommendation of the able lawyers, who, in 1828, were appointed to inquire into the state of the law of real property in England, with a view to its improvement, and the bill was drawn by a conveyancer in good repute for skill and experience; yet it cannot be regarded as a very successful effort of legislation. Indeed, the many questions which have been raised upon it, especially upon the clauses which interfere with established rules of construction, shew how much difficulty and risk must be encountered in attempting to amend the law of property. Yet this is a field in which, in these days of inconsiderate legislation, every shallow pretender to the character of a law reformer will venture to dig.

The 10th section of the Wills Act, though it has not been prolific of litigation, has given rise in its application to a question, or rather, perhaps, to questions of considerable nicety and difficulty; and, notwithstanding the recent decision by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Taylor v. Meads (11 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 166), its construction or scope cannot yet be regarded as settled. The clause, after enacting that no appointment made by will in exercise of any power shall be valid, unless the will be executed in manner required by the act, enacts, that "Every will executed in manner hereinbefore required, shall, so far as respects the execution and attestation thereof, be a valid execution of a power of appointment by will, notwithstanding it shall have been expressly required that a will made in exercise of such power should be executed with some additional or other form of execution or solemnity."

The clause must have been framed without consideration of the settled rule, that a power to be exercised by any "instrument or writing," with or without any special solemnity of execution or attestation, such as sealing or attestation by several witnesses, might be exercised by a will; although, if the power required a deed, without any alternative, an appointment by a testamentary instrument, sealed and delivered, would not be a good execution (Darlington v. Pulleney, Cowp. 260), a deed being in its nature irrevocable. Taking, first, powers created before the passing of the act, it was clear that a power to appoint by any instrument or writing, sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses, could before the act be exercised by will or testamentary instrument so executed and attested. (Kibbet v. Lee, Hob. 312; Roscommon v. Fowke, 4 B. P. O. 528). It was, therefore, a power of appointment by will, and the act seems to have made no alteration with respect to such a power beyond the substitution of the statutory solemnities for those required by the instrument creating the power. Now, it is to be observed, that the ordinary definition of a deed is, "a writing or instrument, written on paper or parchment, sealed and delivered, to prove and testify the agreement of the parties whose deed it is to the things contained in the deed." (Shep. Touch. 50). Here, certainly, it is suggested that the deed must include an agreement, though that is unnecessary, as in the case of an appointment or a disclaimer by deed-poll. But the definition in the Touchstone is imperfect, in omitting the condition that the instrument is not a deed unless it is to take effect according to its purport from the time of the delivery, and is not to be "ambulatory" until the death of the maker. Since the statute, as well as before it, an instrument signed, sealed, and delivered, may be testamentary in its character, incapable of operating as a deed, but capable, if duly executed, of operating as a will. The question, then, is, whether the 10th section, by dispensing with certain formalities, has in any other respect altered the construction of powers of appointment? Can it, for instance, be contended that a power created since the statute, to be exercised "by any instrument, signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of and attested by three witnesses," could not be exercised by a testamentary instrument so executed and attested; in other words, that the donor of the power, by requiring a seal or a superfluous number of witnesses, has manifested his meaning to be, that the instrument must be a deed or a writing not testamentary? To give to the enactment such an operation would, it may be urged, be a reversal of the established rule of construction in such cases. We do not regulate the construction of an executory limitation by reference to the rule against perpetuities, but we first determine the meaning of the words, and then consider whether effect can lawfully be given to that meaning.

On the other hand, it may be said, that powers of appointment, framed since the statute, may properly receive a different construction, because language must always be interpreted with regard to the state of things existing for the time being. If a deed is named, it must be understood to be such an instrument as is a deed according to the law then in force. So of a will; and if, instead of using the technical word, the thing intended is described or defined, with mere or less of precision, the description or definition must be interpreted with reference to the rules or practice then in force. Therefore, when sealing or a cloud of witnesses might lawfully be made a condition of testamentary appointment, the requiring of such solemnities would not shew that a will was not contemplated; but now, when such conditions are wholly ineffectual if the appointment is to be testamentary, does not the imposition of them shew, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, that the donor meant such an instrument as could lawfully be made the subject of such a condition? Before the statute, effect was given to every word of the power, by allowing of an appointment executed in the manner prescribed; and a will so executed would be an instrument, signed &c. But now, under the statute, to strike out the prescribed solemnities would be to interfere without warrant or necessity. If, indeed, the power expressly names "a will" or "a testamentary instrument," executed with other than the statutory solemnities, there can be no room for doubt; there is a clear collision with the statute, and the case is within its very words.

The application of the clause first came into question in the case of Buckell v. Blenkhorn (5 Hare, 131), where, by a deed dated after the passing of the act, a power of appointment was created to be exercised "by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, to be sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by one witness or more." Sir J. Wigram, V. C., held, that the power was well exercised by a will, duly executed under the statute, but not executed according to the power.

In Collard v. Sampson (16 Beav. 543) the question arose upon a power created by indenture, executed in 1835, before the passing of the act, to be exercised by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, under hand and seal, and attested by two witnesses; and the present Master of the Rolls, contrary to his own opinion, decided that a purchaser must accept a title depending under an appointment by an unsealed will, expressly on the authority of Buckell v. Blenkhorn, which, he said, had never been doubted. On appeal, the Lords Justices held, that the question could not be regarded as finally settled by the single decision in Buckell v. Blenkhorn, and declined to force the title upon the purchaser. (4 De G., Mac., & G. 224). We venture to think, that the validity of the decision of the Vice-Chancellor had nothing to do with the question in Collard v. Sampson; and that it was clear, beyond any question, that the power, having been created before the Wills Act, was a power to appoint by deed or will; and, therefore, that an appointment under it by a testamentary instrument was governed by the statute.

In West v. Kay (Kay, 385) the question also arose upon a power created by deed in 1835, and worded similarly to the powers which were the subjects of the decision already cited; and Sir W. P. Wood, V. C., upon a special case, decided that the statute did not apply so as to give effect to an unsealed testamentary appointment; and he based his decision on the ground that the donor had not indicated any intention that the instrument should be testamentary, but had indicated an intention that it should be under seal.

In Orange v. Pickford (4 Drew. 363; 4 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 649) Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., followed the authority of Buckell v. Blenkhorn; but, as appears from the report in THE JURIST, with reference to a power created in 1823.

Lastly, in Taylor v. Meads (10 Jur., part 1, p. 1012), where the power was contained in a will, dated 1841 (subsequently to the passing of the Wills Act), and was to be exercised "by any instrument in writing, signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two witnesses," the Master of the Rolls decided in favour of an appointment by an unsealed will. But this decision was reversed by the Lord Chancellor (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 166), and, we conceive, rightly; although his Lordship, in his judgment, takes no notice of the essential distinction between powers created before the Wills Act and those created subsequently; but lays down the general rule, that the statute only applies to powers "requiring specifically a will."

It will be observed, that although in Taylor v. Meads the Lord Chancellor differed from the Master of the Rolls in his doctrine, he agreed with him in holding that the property was effectually disposed of by the will; for there was a limitation in default of appointment, in trust for the donee of the power, her heirs and assigns, for her separate use; under which his Lordship held that she could devise the equitable fee. The case, therefore, is scarcely to be regarded as a conclusive authority against the doctrine in Buckell v. Blenkhorn.

The Lord Chancellor concluded his judgment on this part of the case with the following unintelligible, but not the less characteristic sentence:—"The difficulty, as is usual, does not arise from any uncertainty as to the principle, but from the reports of conflicting and inconsistent decisions—a state of things which is now the fruitful cause of litigation."

It is to be observed, that Lord St. Leonards clearly approves of the decision in Buckell v. Blenkhorn (Treatise on Powers, 218, 8th ed.; Real Prop. Stat. 333, 2nd ed.)

It has been supposed that a will executed according to the requisitions of the power might, in cases falling within the principle of Taylor v. Meads, be a good execution of the power. But this is clearly not so. The decision can only rest on the assumption that the power does not authorise a testamentary appointment.

THE preliminary address of the members of the council for law reporting, who have been appointed by Lincoln's-inn, the Temple, and the Incorporated Law Society, is in the hands of our readers. The expediency of making the application for subscribers the first step in their proceedings, will be variously estimated. Doubtless, many persons who wish well to the undertaking might hesitate to promote the establishment of a new series of reports unless they were assured that it would be preceded by, or necessarily involve, the extinction of one at least of those which exist. But this is, in substance, provided for by the scheme which the council are appointed to carry into effect. The 12th clause of the scheme provides, that the existing authorised reporters shall have the offer of the first appointments in their respective courts; and in other appointments of reporters, a preference may, if the council think fit, be given to the reporters of any publication which may be discontinued in consequence of the issue of the reports recommended by the committee. The council cannot make any definite offer to the existing reporters until they have ascertained from the subscription list the probable amount of the funds to be disposed of; and the reporters cannot be expected to relinquish, even provisionally, their present independent position until they know what forces will be arrayed against them.

The committee ask for at least 2000 subscribers, at five guineas. We think that the movement has advanced so steadily and so far, that a much more extensive list may be relied on. But every member of either branch of the profession who desires the amendment of the present intolerable system should act as if the result depended on himself, and send in his name at once.

Serjeant's-inn has neither discouraged nor actively supported the scheme, although it is known that many of the judges approve of it. They doubtless feel that their relations to the present reporters are such as to render it improper that they should throw their weight into either scale.

Correspondence.

TAYLOR v. MEADS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—This case is important for other reasons than those so ably stated by your correspondent. If the Master of the Rolls's decision was wrong, I suppose acts of Parliament are not binding on the Court of Chancery. Thus argues the Chancellor, "A will literally answers the description of an instrument in writing. The Statute of Wills, sect. 10, applies to powers to be executed by will, but as an instrument in writing is not literally a will, the statute does not apply to powers to be executed by an instrument in writing." I used to fancy that general terms included particular terms, without being expressly specified, and that as an instrument in writing comprises both a deed and a will, both those documents are expressed in the general term. The Chancellor, who draws such excellent acts of Parliament, is doubtless right in refusing to be bound by such idle rules of logic.

On another subject may I draw your attention to the fact, that Locke King's Act does not touch leaseholds for years, and cannot, I conceive, be conclusive against your correspondent.

Lincoln's Inn, March 6.

T. D. B.

[There is indeed authority, but we are not aware of any reason for excluding leaseholds, whether for years or for lives, from the operation of Locke King's Act. The decision in Solomon v. Solomon (10 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 331) cannot be supported without striking words out of the act.—Ed.]

THE LAND DEBENTURE BILL OF MESSRS. AYRTON AND COLLINS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—An object may be innocent and even laudable in itself, and yet there may be good reasons for not making it too easy of attainment. It is right, for instance, that social opinions and censures should bear in some degree on the personal habits of individuals, but that consideration does not justify the "permissive bill." Our modern reformers are too apt, however, to put on blinkers and run straight at the object before them, without looking to the right or the left. Before we remove obstacles to a given course of action, which our ancestors could have removed long ago, if they had thought fit, it is worth while to inquire, at least, whether their inaction was in any degree sanctioned by their traditional wisdom.

Now, in the matter of facilitating charges on land, we may learn from the experience of Ireland. The registry and system of judgment liens there, gave, in a clumsy manner, those facilities of multiplying charges and holders of charges for which Messrs. Ayrton and Collins undertake to provide more efficient machines. What was the consequence? Charges on land to the last shilling of its value—redemption hopeless—the equity of redemption valueless—the nominal owner indifferent to the condition of his exhausted inheritance—the charges divided among so many incumbrancers, that no one had any paramount interest in the cultivation and welfare of the estate. Concert in any system of management was almost impossible; and at length Hercules was invoked, and appeared in the shape of the Incumbered Estates Court.

From this state of things we have hitherto been saved in England, by exemption from a general registry, and by the beneficial operation of the rule, that the first mortgagee, having the legal estate, may make further advances, or buy up subsequent charges, without being bound to inquire as to the existence of any intermediate incumbrances on the equity of redemption; so that the Arcadian scene contemplated by Messrs. Ayrton and Collins, of a crowd of secure and careless little debenture holders sitting or playing under the shade of the registered title, has hitherto been impossible in England, and every mortgaged estate has either remained moderately incumbered, and still cared for by its owners, or has passed into the hands of a single substantial mortgagee or his vendee, having a like interest in the maintenance of the buildings, and the cultivation of the land. So far, indeed, is the object proposed by the bill in question from being desirable, that the difficulty of restraining the growth of pious incumbrances on registered titles has been the main objection with many thoughtful lawyers to a registration of title. But, as we are fast forgetting that commercial morality is of more importance than the employment of capital, so we seem to be forgetting that the title to land involves duties as well as rights, and is not merely a thing to draw rents from, to sell, or to mortgage. To those legislators who view the bill with favour, I would recommend a careful perusal of Mr. H. R. Droop's judicious remarks "On certain beneficial Effects of the Rule of Tacking, as applied in England to Incumbrances upon Real Estate"—a paper read before the Juridical Society in July, 1864, and published in the last part of their transactions.

Reviews.

The Laws relating to Public Health. By THOMAS BAKER, Esq.

[W. Maxwell; H. Sweet; and Stevens, Sons, & Haynes.]

THE reign of Queen Victoria is already remarkable for the number of acts which the Legislature has passed since its commencement for improving the social condition and comforts of her subjects, and especially the poorer part of them. Care has been taken to provide, by legislative enactments, for the general health, for the comfortable housing of the labouring classes, for the protection of the poor lunatic, for the discovery and destruction of unwholesome and diseased food, and for many other matters in which those who are unable to protect themselves require the aid of a watchful and philanthropic Legislature. The result of these wise measures is, that life is prolonged, sickness diminished, and the general condition of the working classes improved.

These considerations would, we think, impress themselves upon the minds of most persons who read Mr. Baker's book, containing, as it does, an orderly arrangement of the enactments relating to the several subjects which we have mentioned, and an appendix, setting forth the statutes themselves. The author, of course, does not affect originality in the design or execution of his work, but he has expended great care and labour in digesting and arranging the numerous subjects of legislative enactment to which we have alluded, and has collected in notes the decisions relating to them. So that the labour which he has expended himself will relieve others, whose duty it may be to make themselves acquainted with the law on these subjects, from searching into the different statutes, and picking out the provisions which they are desirous of being acquainted with.

The book contains a very full and comprehensive index, and will, we believe, be found a very useful publication to all persons interested, either officially or privately, in the matters of which it treats.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, March 20.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Earl Stanhope said it was, in his opinion, expedient that the plans and estimates for the proposed building should be laid on the table with the least possible delay, so that their Lordships might have time carefully to consider them. He could not understand on what ground the superior advantages presented by the Thames Embankment had been disregarded. He would beg their Lordships to consider for a moment how noble a situation it would be in an architectural point of view. If a building were constructed such as the importance of the occasion demanded, and that it rested on the banks of the river, with Somerset House on the one side, and the Temple on the other, it would possess a river front of a beauty with which not many other river sites in Europe could advantageously compare. But if, on the contrary, the new courts were erected where a block of houses now stood, surrounded by other blocks of houses, the building, whatever its architectural beauty might be, would by no means present so imposing an appearance. He was extremely anxious that the error which had been committed in the case of St. Paul's should now be avoided. The site on the banks of the Thames would, for many reasons, be very convenient. It would have the great advantage of making the new courts accessible by means of water communication, which afforded great facilities in a city whose thoroughfares were crowded to such an extent as greatly to impede the movement of its traffic.

The Lord Chancellor said that no architect has been appointed to devise plans for the building of the courts of justice, or even been thought of for such an office, but there was in the bill a provision for the appointment of a commission to superintend all the architectural plans and details, the constitution of which commission would deserve the very serious attention of the Government. The noble earl had adopted a very inconvenient course in raising the discussion at the present moment. The second reading of the bill, relating to the financial part of this plan, had been postponed, because the other bill, which relates to the site, has not left the House of Commons; and all the evidence which had been or might be taken by the committee of that House upon the question of site should, with the report of that committee, be laid upon their Lordships' table. The case with respect to the embankment would be found to be this:—The portion of the embankment, which some persons had thought might be appropriated as a site for the courts of justice, lay between the eastern extremity of Somerset House and the Temple. Supposing these new buildings to be ranged in a line with the facade of Somerset House; and if they were not, they would be a great architectural deformity; they would only extend for a very few feet upon the embankment itself, and then all the rest of the seven acres and a half which would be absolutely required for the site of the new courts could be obtained only by purchasing at a very great expense a number of houses occupying the southern parts of several streets belonging to the Duke of Norfolk, the acquisition of which would cost a considerably larger sum than that which would be required for the purchase of the Carey-street site. Greater accommodation will be afforded to suitors in the courts, and economy obtained. That could only be accomplished by choosing a site in the immediate neighbourhood of the offices of solicitors, the chambers of barristers, and all those additions to courts of justice which had grown up and were established in that neighbourhood, and which could not be had upon the Thames Embankment. There were no plans for the building of the proposed courts. Those plans must be the subject of consideration by the commission which is to be appointed. As to the site, a very good plan was deposited in the Private Bill-office.

The Earl of Harrowby said, that although the site selected might have been the best that could be found thirty-five years ago, the construction of the Thames Embankment had rendered proper a reconsideration of the question. Viewed with reference to architectural advantages, there could be no comparison between the two sites. That selected by the Government was situated in one of the most crowded parts of the metropolis, and was entirely wanting in good means of access. The best access was by the Strand, but that was often blocked up; and on the other side there was no direct approach to Lincoln's-Inn-fields, except Queen-street, which was at one part very narrow. All the other approaches were mere crooked passages. It would be necessary, therefore, to add to the cost of erecting these buildings the expense which must be incurred in making suitable approaches to them.

The Earl of Longford said, that a plan for the Thames Embankment, submitted by Mr. Newton, proposed to range along that work the whole of the new public buildings of the metropolis. Ready access would then have been obtained to them all, while the inconvenience arising from their present position was so great, that he felt sure such a plan must be eventually adopted.

Lord Redesdale expressed his regret at the decision that the courts were to be removed from Westminster. It had been the opinion of lawyers of days gone by that the distance between their chambers and Westminster conduced to the more careful study of the law; and Lord Lyndhurst often expressed his regret at the prospect of the removal of the courts to a more central position. It was said that the locality they at present occupied was inconvenient on account of its distance from their chambers; but it was a strange thing, if any inconvenience had been felt, that during the last few centuries the dwellings of the lawyers had not been concentrated at Westminster. He believed that the public were gainers by the members of the Legislature residing at some distance from the Houses of Parliament. He doubted the policy of giving an architect seven acres of ground upon which to build, as he would be sure to waste the ground, and make the building inconvenient. Their Lordships had often reason to complain of the unnecessary space which had been bestowed upon that House and its various offices. He also doubted the propriety of concentrating seventy-two courts of law under one roof. The character of the business of those various courts was totally different, and the counsel who attended them were not engaged in the same branches of the law. No doubt the superior courts might be advantageously concentrated, and the inferior courts might also be brought together; but there was no necessity for placing both the superior and the inferior courts under one roof. Another point of great importance was, that by the proposed change their Lordships' House of Appeal would be the only court sitting in that quarter, and it would at some future time be alleged, as a reason for altering their jurisdiction, that it was inconvenient to attend a place so far removed from the other courts of law. He trusted their Lordships would never contemplate the possibility of giving up their jurisdiction as a court of appeal. Therefore, this was a matter which ought to be considered in sanctioning the contemplated removal of the law courts. He believed ample room might be found in that locality for the new courts, provided a moderate space only were assigned for them. There was an excellent site on the other side of Bridge-street, which required improvement, and this he suggested would be just the spot for the erection of the new courts.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday, March 22.

CRIMINAL CASES EVIDENCE BILL.

Mr. Scully consented to the postponement of the second reading of this bill until Monday next.

BILLS IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to abolish Arrest upon Final Process in England, and for the Amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy in certain Particulars.

[The Lord Chancellor.]

Sect. 1. From and after the commencement of this act no person shall be taken or charged in execution or detained upon any judgment, decree, or order obtained or made in any of her Majesty's superior courts, or in any inferior court in England, for the payment of any sum of money, or damages, or costs: provided always, that this act shall not affect the remedies given to creditors under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, intitled "An Act for the better securing the Payment of Small Debts," or under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, intitled "An Act for the more easy Recovery of Small Debts and Demands in England."

2. The remedies given to judgment creditors by sects. 76 to 85, both inclusive, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, shall extend and be applicable to the case of every judgment creditor who would have been entitled to sue out against a debtor a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, or to charge the debtor in execution in respect of any debt amounting to 20*l.*, exclusive of costs, if this act had not passed.

3. The debt of a judgment creditor for 20*l.*, exclusive of costs, petitioning for adjudication of bankruptcy against a debtor, shall be a good petitioning creditor's debt, and sufficient for the purposes of such adjudication.

4. Sects. 98 to 107 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, inclusive, are hereby repealed; but such repeal shall not affect any proceeding pending, or any right that has arisen or may arise in respect of any transaction, act, matter, or thing done under or by virtue of any such sections.

5. No order of discharge in any bankruptcy shall be granted, nor shall the same if granted protect any estate, property, income, or salary which a bankrupt may acquire, possess, or become entitled to, after the date of such order of discharge, unless the estate of the bankrupt shall have paid, or shall be sufficient to pay, in bankruptcy, a dividend or dividends of 5*s.* in the pound upon all the debts proved in such bankruptcy, or unless creditors who have proved, and whose debts are equal to three-fourths of the whole amount of the debts proved, shall, by writing under their hands, consent to such order of discharge: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall affect any power now vested in the commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy and judges of the county courts of refusing, suspending, or annexing conditions to any order of discharge.

6. This act shall apply only to England.

7. This act shall be cited for all purposes as "The Abolition of Arrest Act, 1865."

8. This act shall commence and take effect on the 20th June next.

A Bill to enable the Benchers of the Inns of Court to appoint Judicial Committees in certain Cases, and to give the necessary Powers to such Committees.

[Sir George Bowyer and Mr. Hennessy.]

Sect. 1. That whenever any charge or complaint connected with or affecting the practice and the duties or the honour of the legal profession shall be made against any barrister to the benchers of the inn of court in England of which he is a member, and also whenever the benchers of any of the four inns of court shall deem it necessary or expedient for the honour and credit of the legal profession to inquire into the conduct of any barrister or other member of their inn, and also whenever any objection to the call to the bar of any student shall be made to the benchers of the inn of court to which such student belongs, or to the admission as a student of any person, in every such case it shall be lawful for such benchers, if they shall think fit, to elect from their own body five benchers to constitute a judicial committee to hear and determine such charge or complaint, or such matter of inquiry, or such objection as aforesaid.

2. It shall be lawful for any such judicial committee elected as aforesaid, and they are hereby required, in every such case, to hear and determine every such charge or complaint, or such matter of inquiry, and every such objection as aforesaid; and such judicial committee shall have the power to disbar any barrister, or to expel from the inn any barrister or other member of such inn whom such committee shall find guilty of any offence deserving such punishment, or to suspend any such barrister or other member of the inn from practice for any time that they shall think proper; and also such committee shall have power to hear and determine any objection made to the call to the bar of any student as aforesaid, or to the admission of any person as a student.

3. No barrister shall be disbarred or suspended from practice, no barrister or other member of any inn shall be expelled from such inn, and no student shall be refused to be called to the bar, and no person shall be refused admission as a student to any inn of court, except by decision of a judicial committee elected under the provisions of this act.

4. It shall be lawful for any barrister or other member of any inn of court against whom any charge or complaint shall be brought before, or whose conduct shall be inquired into by any such judicial committee, or any person whose call or admission shall be objected to as aforesaid, to challenge any of the members of such judicial committee not exceeding three, and the benchers of the inn of court by whom such committee was elected shall thereupon choose some other benchers or benchers of such inn of court to hear and determine such charge, or complaint, or objection in the place of the member or members so challenged.

5. In every case within the provisions of this act an appeal shall lie from such judicial committee to the judges of the superior courts of common law, that is to say, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.

6. It shall be lawful for the judges of the said superior courts of common law, or any five of them, from time to time to frame, alter, and amend rules and regulations for the election of such judicial committees, and for the procedure of such judicial committees, and of appeals from their decisions.

7. Such judicial committees as aforesaid, and the judges hearing any appeal therefrom, shall in all cases sit in open court, unless all parties to the case shall agree that such case shall be heard in private, and the judgments of such judicial committees and of the judges on appeal respectively shall be in writing, stating the reasons on which such judgments are grounded.

8. The said judicial committees, and the judges sitting on appeal therefrom, shall have all the powers of compelling the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers and documents, and of punishing for contempts, and all other the powers which by law belong to a court of record, and also the power of administering an oath or affirmation, as the case may be, to any witness appearing before them.

9. Any person examined before any such judicial committee or before the judges on appeal therefrom, who shall wilfully give false evidence, shall be liable to the penalties of perjury.

GENERAL EXAMINATION.—TRINITY TERM, 1865.

THE Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the public examination of the students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement to students to propose themselves for such examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each, and twenty-five guineas per annum each respectively, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination; and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong, may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the Bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the Bar those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition, or a certificate of honour at such examination, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

RULES FOR THE PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR HONOURS, OR CERTIFICATES ENTITLING STUDENTS TO BE CALLED TO THE BAR.

An examination will be held in next Trinity Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship, an exhibition, or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the Bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs on or before Monday, the 15th day of May next; and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction, or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the Bar.

The examination will commence on Monday, the 22nd day of May next, and will be continued on the Tuesday and Wednesday following.

It will take place in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Monday morning, the 22nd May, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Tuesday morning, the 23rd May, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Wednesday morning, the 24th May, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Wednesday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary, according as the student is a candidate for honours, or desires simply to obtain a certificate.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned, regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the Bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship or exhibition, but only at the general examination immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship or exhibition, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship or the exhibition.

THE READER ON CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY will expect the candidates for honours to be well acquainted with the origin and progress of our Laws and Constitution, as explained in chap. 8, part 3, of Hallam's History of the Middle Ages.

He will expect them to be well acquainted with the reign of Richard II, and with the chapters in Hallam's Constitutional History which comprise the reigns from the accession of Henry VII to the death of Anne; with the Trials of persons eminent in our history, or otherwise important, from the accession of Elizabeth to the year 1760; with the History of the Law of Treason and the Law of Libel.

All candidates will be required to know the chief events in English History from the Conquest to the year 1796; to have an accurate knowledge of the reigns of the Stuart Kings, of the Trials of Vane, Sidney, Russell, Colledge, Mrs. Gaunt, and Lady Lisle; to be thoroughly acquainted with the provisions of Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Act of Settlement, the Habeas Corpus Acts, and the Toleration Act.

THE READER ON EQUITY proposes to examine in the following books:—

1. Haynes's Outlines of Equity; Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence; Hunter's Elementary View of the Proceedings in a Suit in Equity, part 1.

2. The Cases and Notes contained in the 1st volume of White & Tudor's Leading Cases; the Act to further amend the Law of Property and to relieve Trustees, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35; the Act to further amend the Law of Property, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38; the Act to give to Trustees, Mortgagees, and others, certain Powers now commonly inserted in Settlements, Mortgages, and Wills, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145; the Act to regulate the Procedure in the High Court of Chancery and the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42; the General Orders of the Court of Chancery of the 1st February, 1861, and of the 5th February, 1861 (7 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 58); Mitford on Pleadings in the Court of Chancery—Introduction, c. 1, ss. 1, 2; c. 1, s. 3 (the first six pages); c. 2, s. 1; c. 2, s. 2, part 1 (the first three pages); c. 2, s. 2, part 2 (the first two pages); c. 2, s. 2, part 3; c. 3.

Candidates for certificates of having passed a satisfactory examination will be expected to be well acquainted with the books mentioned in the first of the above classes.

Candidates for a studentship, exhibition, or honours will be examined in the books mentioned in the two classes.

The READER on the LAW of REAL PROPERTY, &c., proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Joshua Williams on the Law of Real Property, 6th ed.

2. Powers—Josiah Wm. Smith on Real and Personal Property, 3rd ed., pp. 339–357, 723–748.

3. Joint Tenancy, and Tenancy in Common.—Morley v. Bird (3 Ves. 629), and the notes to that case in Tudor's Leading Cases in Conveyancing, 2nd ed., pp. 778–802.

4. Gifts to Classes—Viner v. Francis (2 Cox, 190); Wild's case (6 Rep. 16 b); and the notes to those cases in Tudor's Leading Cases in Conveyancing, 702, 581; and Hayes & Jarman's Concise Wills, 6th ed., by Eastwood, pp. 210–214.

5. Sanders on Uses, 5th ed., by Sanders & Warner, c. 2, pp. 83–276.

Candidates for the studentship, exhibition, or honours will be examined in all the foregoing books and subjects; candidates for a certificate in those under heads 1, 2, and 3.

The READER on JURISPRUDENCE, the CIVIL LAW, and INTERNATIONAL LAW proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Justinian's Institutes, book 3, tit. 1–23, with the Notes of Ortolan or Sandars.

2. Justiniana—Novella, 118; Justiniana—Novella, 127.

3. Mackeldeii—Systema Juris Romani hodie Usitati—Pars Specialis, lib. 4, § 2, c. 1; De Successione ab Intestato, § 615–622; lib. 2, § 2, c. 1, § 353–442.

4. Code Napoleon, livre 3, tit. 1, art. 718–814.

5. Wheaton's Elements of International Law (ed. 1863), part 4, c. 3—"Rights of War as to Neutrals," art. 19–32, pp. 736–858.

6. Maine's Ancient Law, c. 7, p. 215.

Candidates for honours will be examined in all the above subjects; but candidates for a pass certificate will be examined in 1, 5, and 6 only.

The READER on COMMON LAW proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

Candidates for a pass certificate will be examined in—

1. The ordinary Steps and Course of Pleading in an Action.

2. Broom's Commentaries (3rd ed.), book 1, c. 3—

"Nature of Rights enforceable by Action;" book 2, c. 1—"Of Contracts generally;" book 3, c. 1—"Of Torts generally."

3. Smith on Contracts (last ed.), lect. 1–5 inclusive.

4. The Criminal Law Consolidation and Amendment Acts (by Greaves), so far as they relate to the undermentioned offences:—Murder and Manslaughter, Simple Larceny, Embezzlement, and False Pretences.

Candidates for the studentship, exhibition, or honours will be examined in the above-named books and subjects, and also in—

5. Story on Bailments (last ed.), cc. 1 and 2, and c. 6, art. 8 (so far as it concerns land carriers), with which should be read the Carriers Act (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 68).

6. The following cases:—Backhouse v. Bonomi (9 H. L. C. 503); Chasemore v. Richards (7 H. L. C. 349); Hooper v. Lane (6 H. L. C. 443); and Emmens v. Elderton (4 H. L. C. 624).

7. Smith's Mercantile Law (last ed.), book 1, cc. 4, 5—"Of Corporations, and Principal and Agent."

8. Taylor on Evidence (4th ed.), book 1, c. 5—"Presumptive Evidence."

By order of the Council,

WESTBURY, C., Chairman.

Council Chamber, Lincoln's Inn,

March 15, 1865.

PROSPECTUS OF THE LECTURES

To be delivered during the ensuing Trinity Educational Term, by the several Readers appointed by the Inns of Court.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Reader, after dwelling on the reign of Elizabeth, will trace the History of our Constitution from the reign of Charles the First to the reign of Anne.

He will illustrate the history of each reign by references to the Statutes, the State Trials, the Reports, and the Debates in Parliament.

The books to which he will usually refer are:—Blackstone's Commentaries, by Kerr—Rapin's History—Clarendon's History—May's History—Burnet's Memoirs—Hallam's Constitutional History—Somers's Tracts—State Tracts—Ralph's History—Millar's History—Brodie's History—Parliamentary History.

In his Private Classes he will pursue the same plan from the reign of Mary downwards, and, if time allows, will return to the earlier period of our History.

EQUITY.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, Two Courses of Public Lectures (there being Six Lectures in each Course), on the following subjects:—

An Elementary Course.

1. On the Relief afforded in Equity against the consequences of Mistake (continued).

2. On the Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in Matters of Account.

3. On Equitable Set-off and the Appropriation of Payments.

An Advanced Course.

1. On the Equitable Doctrine of Election (continued).

2. On Contracts of Suretyship, and the Equitable Rights to which they give rise.

In the Elementary Private Class, the subjects discussed will be—The Rules for determining the Priority of Charges on Real and Personal Property—The Law of Partnership as modified by Courts of Equity.

In the Advanced Private Class, the Lectures will comprehend—The Administration of Real Assets, and the Principles of Equity Pleading (continued), and Relief on the ground of actual fraud.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, &c.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c. proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, Two Courses of Public Lectures (there being Six Lectures in each Course), on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

1. The Law of Mortmain and Charitable Uses, in continuation and conclusion of the last Term's Lectures on this subject.
2. The Law relating to Land of Copyhold Tenure.

Advanced Course.

1. The Law of Prescription.
2. The Law of Fire Insurance.

In his Private Classes, the Reader will, with the Elementary Class, continue his Course of Real Property Law, using the work of Mr. Joshua Williams as a Text-book; and with the Advanced Class, the Reader will complete the perusal of Mr. Sandars's work on Uses and Trusts.

JURISPRUDENCE, THE CIVIL LAW, AND INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The Reader on Jurisprudence, the Civil Law, and International Law proposes, in the ensuing Educational Term, to deliver Six Public Lectures upon the following subjects:—

1. The Historical Development of the Roman Law of Contract.
2. The Comparative Jurisprudence of Rome, England, and France, with respect to the Contract of Sale.
3. The Roman Law relating to the Warranty of the Vendor against Eviction, and also against Latent Defects in the Property sold.
4. The Rules of Modern International Law relating to Neutral Trade with an Enemy, and Contraband of War.

In his Private Class, the Reader proposes to continue the Course of Roman Civil Law upon Contracts, using Sandars's Edition of Justinian's Institutes, and the Systema Juris Romani of Mackelvey as Text-books.

The Reader in his Private Class will also discuss points of International Law as to the Commencement of the War, and its immediate Effects; and also Rights of War as between Enemies, using the Treatise of Wheaton as the Text-book, and referring to the works of the principal modern Jurists, the decisions of the Admiralty and Prize Courts of England and America, the Debates in Parliament, and State Papers relating to the cases under discussion.

COMMON LAW.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, Two Courses of Six Public Lectures each, on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

1. A Comparison will be instituted between the Ingredients in a Crime and those in a Cause of Action on Contract or on Tort.
2. The Origin and Jurisdiction of our Criminal Courts will be investigated.
3. Criminal Procedure will be exemplified by reference to—

- (1). The Proceedings before a Magistrate on a Criminal Charge.
- (2). The Trial at Quarter Sessions, or at the Assizes, of a Person charged with an Indictable Offence.

In treating the above Subjects, Rules of Evidence will especially be noticed.

Advanced Course.

1. The Nature of and Ingredients in an Indictable Offence.
2. The Structure and Office of an Indictment, with a Specification of the Pleas available in Criminal Cases.
3. Ordinary Offences against the Person or Property.
4. Points connected with the Law of Evidence in relation to Criminal Proceedings.

With his Private Class, the Reader will examine in detail the foregoing subjects, referring to the under-mentioned Books:—

Elementary Class:—Broom's Commentaries (last edition); Paley on Convictions; Archbold's Criminal Pleading, by Welsby.

Advanced Class:—The Criminal Law Consolidation and Amendment Acts (edited by Greaves); Roscoe's Digest of Evidence in Criminal Cases; Taylor on Evidence (last edition).

EXAMINATION ON THE SUBJECTS OF LECTURES AND CLASSES.

The Examinations for Exhibitions on the Subjects of Lectures and Classes delivered in the three Educational Terms, 1864-5, will commence on Monday, the 3rd July, at Lincoln's Inn Hall.

Students who propose offering themselves for Examination must enter their names on or before Thursday, the 1st June next, at the Steward's Office, Lincoln's Inn; and a Reader's Certificate of having duly attended the Lectures and Classes, on the Subjects in which a Student offers himself for Examination, must be sent to the Council of Legal Education, at Lincoln's Inn, on or before Monday, the 19th June.

Students, having duly attended the Lectures and Classes of one or more of the Readers, are qualified to enter for Examination on such Subjects, but they are not allowed to enter for the Elementary and Advanced Examination on the same Subject, and provided that the Terms they have kept do not exceed the limits prescribed by clause 59 of the Consolidated Regulations of the Inns of Court.

The Examinations for the Exhibitions will be partly oral and partly in writing, by means of printed papers of questions.

The following Days and Hours have been set apart for the said Examination:—

Monday Morning, the 4th July, from 9:30 to 12:30—Constitutional Law and Legal History.

Monday Afternoon, the 4th July, from 1:30 to 4:30—Jurisprudence, Civil, and International Law.

Tuesday Morning, the 5th July, from 9:30 to 12:30—On Equity.

Tuesday Afternoon, the 5th July, from 1:30 to 4:30—On the Common Law.

Wednesday Morning, the 6th July, from 9:30 to 12:30—The Law of Real Property; and Wednesday Afternoon, the 6th July, from 1:30 to 4:30—A Paper composed of Three Questions on each of the foregoing Subjects of Examination.

INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCE,

"The essential feature of an Indisputable Policy is, that it is granted on one condition, that the person assured 'is now living.' Such is the form of expression devised by that astute of lawyers the present Lord Chancellor, to exclude all questions of fraud or misrepresentations. The Society (the Indisputable Life Assurance) appears to act on this principle; and we are glad to learn that their financial condition is such as we should have anticipated from the carrying on of their business on what are obviously sound as well as equitable principles."—

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 1, 1866.

In a former article (vide supra, p. 75) we called the attention of our readers to some of the late decisions in the Court of Common Pleas, on appeals from the revising barristers in last Michaelmas Term. We reviewed some of the cases, and endeavoured to point out the important features of these decisions. It may be, perhaps, profitable to glance at such of the remaining cases as involve important principles in registration law, and which our space then compelled us to forego. The case of Heelis, App., Blain, Resp. (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 18), turned on the construction to be put on the words "actual possession," as used in the 26th section of the Reform Act. It was a claim to the county franchise by the owner of a rent-charge. The 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45, by sect. 26, provides, "That no person shall be entitled to vote in the election of a knight of the shire to serve in any future Parliament unless he shall have been duly registered," &c., and that "no person shall be so registered in any year in respect of his estate or interest in any lands or tenements, &c., unless he shall have been in the actual possession thereof, or in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, for his own use, for six calendar months at least next previous to the last day of July in such year." The claimant was the owner of a rent-charge, and derived title as follows:—By indenture of the 3rd November, 1862, a rent-charge of 50*l.* per annum was conveyed to one Stephen Heelis, his heirs and assigns, for ever. By indenture of the 29th January, 1864, made between Stephen Heelis of the first part, John Heelis of the second part, and the five sons of the said Stephen Heelis of the third part, the said rent-charge was granted to John Heelis and his heirs, to the use of the five sons of Stephen Heelis, their heirs and assigns, for ever, as tenants in common. The claimant was one of the five sons of Stephen Heelis. The half-year's rent became due, and was paid in June, 1864, and was the first rent which accrued after the deed of the 29th January. At common law the claimant would not have been in possession of the rent-charge until payment of some portion of the rent-charge. But it was contended, that the stat. 27 Hen. 8, c. 10, gave the cestui que use actual possession immediately on the execution of the deed creating the use. That statute provides, "that where any person or persons stand or be seised of any manors, lands, tenements, rents and profits, &c., to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or persons, by reason of any bargain, sale, contract, agreement, &c., or otherwise, that in any such case all and every such person or persons, &c. that have any such use, confidence, or trust, shall from henceforth stand and be seised, deemed, and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate, and possession of and in the same manors, lands, tenements, rents, and profits, &c., to all intents and purposes of law." It was argued ably and successfully for the appellant, the claimant, by Mr. Joshua Williams, that the Statute of Uses intended and did pass the "actual possession" to the cestui que use immediately on the execution of the deed creating the use. It was contended on behalf of the respondent, the objector, that there could not be an actual possession, such as was intended by the Legislature in sect. 26 of the Reform Act, until the receipt of some portion of the rent-charge; but the Court held, that the statute gave the actual possession to the cestui que use immediately on the execution of the instrument creating the use, and that the "actual possession" intended by the Legislature in the Reform Act, was such a possession as was conferred on the cestui que use by the Statute of Uses. The next important appeal, Smith, App., Foreman, Resp. (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 42), was a claim to the county franchise by an alleged occupier of premises of the annual value of 60*l.*, under a franchise conferred by the 20th section of the Reform Act. The facts as stated were as follows:—The claimant had occupied a house and land of the annual value of 40*l.* above all charges during the qualifying period, and he had also occupied under the same landlord jointly with his (the claimant's) father, a house and land in the same election district, of the annual value of 64*l.* above all charges, and it was contended that the claimant was entitled, by virtue of the Registration Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 73, to tack these two holdings together, and so make up an occupation of a sufficient annual value to confer a vote. Now, the 73rd section of the 6 Vict. c. 78, relied on for the claimant, provides, "That where any lands and tenements shall be jointly rented and occupied by more persons than one, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered, and vote in an election, in respect of the lands and tenements so jointly rented and occupied, in case the yearly rent for which they shall be bonâ fide liable in respect of such lands and tenements shall be of an amount which, when divided by the number of such occupants, shall give a bonâ fide rent of 50*l.* for each and every such occupier, but not otherwise." It was said, on behalf of the objector, that if the statute intended to permit occupiers to tack several occupations, it would have said "a yearly rent or rents;" and reference was made to the judgment of Chief Justice Tindal, in Gadsby, App., Barrow, Resp. (1 Lutw. Reg. Cas. 142), where that eminent judge makes the same observation on the construction of the statute. The Court, however, held, that the claimant could not tack these two holdings, so as to bring himself within the 20th section of the Reform Act in point of value. This is an important decision, and one which will govern a number of claims, and will probably exclude a large class of claimants. If the Court had decided that the claimant might tack his two holdings, then an occupier of any number of small holdings would be entitled to be registered, and to vote in the election of county members, provided the number of holdings together were of sufficient annual value. Such a decision would let in an entirely new class of voters to the county franchise. In our former article we referred to Scott, App., Durant, Resp. (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 115), where it was held, that the formalities in case of appeal required by the 42nd section of the Registration Act, cannot be dispensed with under any circumstances, or even waived by consent of the parties to the appeal. The two remaining appeals of importance were Powell, App., Boraston, Resp. (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 160), and Powell, App., Farmer, Resp. (Id. 162). In both these cases the question turned on the meaning of the word "building" as used in the 27th section of the Reform Act. In the former of these, a building was erected on land occupied by the claimant by an electioneering agent. At the time of the demise of the land to the claimant there was no building on the land. The agent had no interest in the land occupied by the claimant, but, for election purposes, he caused to be erected on the land a shed made of boards nailed to posts let into the ground; and the claimant occupied this shed, and kept in it some agricultural implements. The Court held, and we are certainly not surprised at the decision, that this shed was not a "building" within the meaning of the words "or other building," as used in the 27th section of the Reform Act. The judgment of the Court, which was delivered by Chief Justice Erle, after consideration, is a long and learned discourse. In it he reviews the case of Cook, App., Humber, Resp. (11 C. B., N. S., 33), which is a leading case upon the four great heads of qualification,—"tenement, value, occupation, and estate." Both the judgment in the last-named case and in Powell, App., Farmer, Resp., are worthy an attentive perusal, and amount, in fact, to a treatise on this most difficult subject. The Chief Justice also referred to Watson, App., Cotton, Resp. (5 C. B. 51), where it was held that the finding of the revising barrister is conclusive as to the facts, and where the amusing dictum of the late Mr. Justice Maule occurs, when he said—"The barrister describes two sides of 'building.' The rest may be of solid masonry." The fact being, that the barrister only described two sides, because there were only two sides. In the other appeal, Powell, App., Farmer, Resp., the claimant was a market gardener, and occupied land in a borough. At the time of the demise there was no building on the land, but the claimant erected on the land at his own cost a structure supported by wooden posts let into the ground, having boarded sides and a thatched roof. The revising barrister held this structure to be a building within the meaning of the Reform Act, and the Court of Common Pleas upheld his decision. These last two appeals are amongst the most important of the registration cases of Michaelmas Term, 1864.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—The recent judgment in the Privy Council, in the case of the Bishop of Natal, seems to be interpreted by many in a sense thus expressed by the Saturday Review:—"The letters-patent which gave them," the colonial bishops, "authority are null and void; but the fact, that they are appointed by the Crown, enables the Crown to restrain them from exercising any other kind of authority. The Crown cannot give them legal jurisdiction; but, as they have accepted their appointment from it, it can and will prevent them from accepting a purely spiritual jurisdiction from any one else." Now, this is a view which, I believe, few lawyers who consider the judgment even in itself, and still fewer who consider it in connection with the principles upheld in another case by the same high Court, will adopt.

There is no passage in the judgment which declares the patent, either of the Bishop of Cape Town or of the Bishop of Natal, to be null and void. "Let it be granted or assumed," say their Lordships, "that the letters-patent are sufficient in law to confer on Dr. Gray the ecclesiastical status of metropolitan, and to create between him and the Bishops of Natal and Grahams Town the personal relation of metropolitan and suffragan as ecclesiastics, yet it is quite clear that the Crown had no power to confer any jurisdiction, or coercive legal authority, upon the metropolitan over the suffragan bishops, or over any other person." And again—"There is, therefore, no power in the Crown to create any new or ecclesiastical tribunal or jurisdiction, and the clauses which purport to do so, contained in the letters-patent to the appellant and respondent, are simply void in law." The italics are my own, and they point out to what extent, and to what extent only, the patents of these bishops have been declared nullities.

But a further examination will shew that it is distinctly on the ground of the patents, and, therefore, on the supposition that they are not altogether nullities, that the judgment rests. "If, then," say their Lordships, "the Bishop of Cape Town had no jurisdiction by law, did he obtain any by contract or submission on the part of the Bishop of Natal? . . . Even if the parties intended to enter into any such agreement (of which, however, we find no trace), it was not legally competent to the Bishop of Natal to give, or to the Bishop of Cape Town to accept or exercise, any such jurisdiction." I apprehend that it is quite impossible for any one, who supposes the patents to have been treated as mere nullities, to reconcile this passage with the doctrine of the Judicial Committee in the case of Long v. The Bishop of Cape Town. Their Lordships said, in that case, "We think that the acts of Mr. Long must be construed with reference to the position in which he stood, as a clergyman of the Church of England, towards a lawfully appointed bishop of that Church, and to the authority known to belong to that office in England; and we are of opinion that, by taking the oath of canonical obedience to his lordship, and accepting from him a license to officiate and have the cure of souls within the parish of Mowbray, subject to revocation for just cause, and by accepting the appointment to the living of Mowbray under a deed, which expressly contemplated, as one means of avoidance, the removal of the incumbent for any lawful cause, Mr. Long did voluntarily submit himself to the authority of the bishop to such an extent as to enable the bishop to deprive him of his benefice for any lawful cause; that is, for such cause as (having regard to any differences which may arise from the circumstances of the colony) would authorise the deprivation of a clergyman by his bishop in England. We adopt the language of Mr. Justice Watermeyer, that, 'for the purpose of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, we are to take them as having contracted that the laws of the Church of England shall, though only as far as applicable here [that is, in the colony], govern both.'"

The blot in the Bishop of Cape Town's case was, that he had deprived Mr. Long for something which was not a sufficient cause of deprivation by the ecclesiastical law of England; the jurisdiction which he claimed he possessed by contract. How, then, is this to be reconciled with the denial, by the Judicial Committee, not only of the actual, but also of the possible, existence of consensual jurisdiction over the Bishop of Natal?

The answer to the question is to be found in the opening passages of the recent judgment, which form the pivot it turns on; and yet have been strangely overlooked by those who have commented on it in the public press. "The Bishop of Natal and the Bishop of Cape Town (who are the parties to this proceeding) are ecclesiastical persons who have been created bishops by the Queen, in the exercise of her authority as sovereign of this realm and head of the Established Church. These bishops are consecrated, under mandate from the Queen, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the manner prescribed by the law of England. They received and hold their dioceses under grants made by the Crown. Their status, therefore, both ecclesiastical and temporal, must be ascertained and defined by the law of England; and it is plain that their legal existence depends on acts which have no validity or effect, except on the basis of the supremacy of the Crown. Further: their respective and relative rights and liabilities must be determined by the principles of English law, applied to the construction of the grants to them contained in the letters-patent; for they are the creatures of English law, and dependent on that law for their existence, rights, and attributes. We must treat the parties before us as standing on this foundation, and on no other."

The whole of these sentences, and especially the last, which I have italicised, are decisive as to the reason why no consensual jurisdiction over the Bishop of Natal was held to be possible. Their Lordships take their stand on the principle, that a public functionary appointed by royal letters-patent, cannot, by his own private act, so modify the conditions of his office as to subject himself to deprivation in a way not pointed out by the law. They by no means intend to deny what in Mr. Long's case they asserted, that the incumbent of a benefice created by private liberality, and unknown to the law except by virtue of the trusts of its endowment, can subject himself to any conditions which may be consistent with those trusts. But this was a ground of decision incompatible with holding the patent to be null, the obvious effect of which would be to leave the so-called patentee free to contract any engagements he pleased. It follows, then, that their Lordships are still of the opinion expressed by them in the above extract from their judgment in Long v. The Bishop of Cape Town, namely, that the Bishop of Cape Town, and, by parity of reason, the Bishop of Natal also, is towards his clergy "a lawfully appointed bishop of the Church of England;" and that when, in the recent judgment, they "grant or assume" the sufficiency of the letters-patent to create personal relations, although the language is properly guarded, in order to avoid prejudicing a point not before them, yet it expresses their real sentiments. It was not competent, the Judicial Committee tells us, "to establish a metropolitan see or province, or to create an ecclesiastical corporation, whose status, rights, and authority the colony could be required to recognise;" but that does not affect the personal relations.

The clergy and laity who accept the Queen's bishops share in the order and liberty of the Church of this country. Suppose, for instance, that one of those clergymen, under the trusts of his endowment, similar to those of Mr. Long's, should be accused of heresy, which, on the principles of Mr. Long's case, would be a just cause of deprivation, he could claim the benefit of The Gorham case, the case of Essays and Reviews, and all the other English authorities on the subject. To preserve this order and liberty for those of her people who desire it, and thereby serve the two indissoluble causes of truth and virtue, the head of the English Church has sent out bishops, on whom, as the Privy Council has now in effect held, the burthen of that high duty must lie till they are deprived of it by legal process, or freed from it by legal resignation. The members of that episcopal synod which has professed to set up a church of South Africa, not bound by the laws or authorities of the Church of England, if they should succeed in their object, will forfeit all authority over their clergy, either under the trusts of endowments given for the Church of England, or under oaths of obedience which, having been taken to public patent officers, were necessarily oaths of obedience according to the laws of the Church of England, and not further or otherwise. It is not here the place to discuss whether this would be a useful result for the good government and discipline of the South African dioceses; or whether it is moral and honest in those bishops to abjure the laws of the Church of England, without formally resigning their patents, and ceasing to insist on the oaths of obedience taken to them. The conscience has intricate windings, by which, no doubt, they justify their course to themselves; but, to an impartial mind, I apprehend that the two recent South African appeals have defined the Church of England in the colonies, as a body constituted by voluntary adhesion to bishops, lawfully appointed for the purpose, and whose own power of acting and contracting is, therefore, limited by the legal conditions of their tenure.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

JOHN WESTLAKE.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, March 24.

PRIVATE BILLS COSTS BILL.

Lord Houghton, in moving the second reading of this bill, which had come from the House of Commons, stated that the debatable part of it consisted of two clauses. The first of these provided, that when a committee of the House of Commons unanimously reported that the preamble of a bill was not proved, the opponents should be paid the costs of their opposition. He admitted that in this matter legislation came rather late, and that this was a case of shutting the stable door after a great many horses had been stolen. Innumerable vexations had been caused to persons who had been compelled to petition against private bills, especially against railway bills, and of these hardships, no doubt, some of their Lordships had been the victims. There was in the House of Commons at the present moment a very strong feeling against allowing a bill which had once been rejected to go to a second reading—an objection which was recently very strongly manifested in the case of the contest between the Great Northern and Great Eastern Railway Companies. That feeling had, no doubt, mainly arisen from the want of a measure of this kind, because if this bill became law, those who introduced vexatious bills, and put either landowners or companies to expense, would themselves be losers. The second clause enacted, that when a committee unanimously reported that opposition had been unfounded, the promoters should recover costs. This part of the bill would require serious consideration in committee, because it was possible that there might be cases in which private individuals would suffer severely from coming into collision with powerful companies. He did not, however, look upon that as a very immediate danger, because he contemplated that this bill would act rather by exciting fear, and preventing the evils against which it was directed, than by active operation for their remedy. All the questions which would arise were rather matters for discussion in committee—when it would, he thought, be desirable to insert a clause extending the operation of the bill to committees of their Lordships' House—than for debate upon this stage of the measure; and, therefore, without further observations, he moved that the bill should be read a second time.

Lord Redesdale said that he entirely approved the principle of the bill, and rejoiced that it had passed through the House of Commons, because in former times the objection which was generally raised to the proposal of such a measure was, that it would never receive the sanction of that House. He concurred with the noble Lord who had charge of the bill in desiring that its operation should be extended to committees of their Lordships' House, and suggested that another amendment would also be required. As the measure was now drawn, costs could not be recovered from the promoters of a bill, unless the preamble was unanimously rejected by the committee. That was a reasonable arrangement as far as public companies were concerned; but as private individuals seldom opposed the whole bill, the same argument did not apply to them. He thought that if a petitioner shewed that his right had been wantonly interfered with, and obtained a protecting clause, he ought to have his costs.

The Lord Chancellor said that he entirely concurred with the noble chairman of committees, and he should be happy to communicate with the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of the bill, and assist him in preparing a clause, which should extend the operation of the measure in the manner which had been suggested.

After a few words from Lord Houghton in reply, The bill was read a second time.

The Felony and Misdemeanour Evidence and Practice Bill passed through committee without amendments.

Monday, March 27.

The Private Bills Costs Bill passed through committee, with amendments, extending the operation of the bill to the committees of this as well as of the other House of Parliament, and authorising the allowance of costs to individuals in cases in which, though the preamble of the bill may have been proved, some clauses shall have been inserted or omitted, in order to protect the interests of the petitioner.

Tuesday, March 28.

The Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, March 24.

THE MURDER AT SAFFRON HILL.

Mr. Roebuck asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he had seen any necessity for inquiring into the conduct of the police on the trial of S. Pelizzoni for murder; and if so, to what conclusion he had come on the subject. He put the question on the part of a very worthy gentleman, Mr. Negretti.

Sir G. Grey replied, that he had not found it necessary to institute any inquiry into the conduct of the police, for no facts had been laid before him to warrant an inquiry, but all the circumstances had been investigated before a judge. The facts of the case were well known. Pelizzoni was charged with murder, tried on that charge before Mr. Baron Martin, and found guilty, not on circumstantial evidence, but on the most direct evidence of several witnesses. Mr. Baron Martin, in reporting on that case, expressed his entire concurrence in the verdict, but at the same time stated that, though the facts justified the verdict of murder, the circumstances of the case were such as, in his opinion, did not require that the sentence of the law should be executed, and he suggested that the sentence should be commuted for some other minor punishment. The learned judge added that, as proceedings were to be taken against another man for the same offence, it would be well that any decision on the matter should be suspended until the nature of the evidence in the second case should be ascertained. The other man, Gregorio, was put on trial before Mr. Justice Byles, and was convicted of manslaughter, and he should have been glad to take that verdict as deciding the case, but, by a communication from Mr. Justice Byles, he was informed that that verdict was not satisfactory to the judge. He had thought it right to send the notes of the second trial to Mr. Baron Martin, and to ask his opinion on the whole case. The learned judge had written a very detailed report of his opinion, and expressed his entire concurrence with Mr. Justice Byles's opinion, that the verdict in the second case was not satisfactory; adding, that the case required great consideration, as it was one of importance with regard to the criminal law. Under these circumstances, he had thought it his duty to submit all the papers to the law officers of the Crown, and, as there were two other cases against Pelizzoni for stabbing, he referred the question to the law officers whether, with all the facts before them, they were of opinion that there was sufficient evidence for putting Pelizzoni on his trial for the minor charge of stabbing. In consequence of the answer he had received, he had directed that Pelizzoni should be put on his trial at the next sessions for the minor charge of stabbing, and he hoped that the trial would have the result of clearing away any doubts on this subject.

Tuesday, March 28.

The Married Women's Property (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The House went into committee on the Mortgage Debentures Bill and the Land Debentures Bill, and immediately agreed to report progress.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

Abstract of Land Debentures Bill, as amended by Select Committee.

[Mr. Ayrton and Mr. Collins.]

Sect. 1. Act to be read with Transfer of Land Act.

2. Act to extend to England only.

3. Short title.

4. The right given by the 70th section of the principal act to a registered proprietor when he shall be desirous of mortgaging his registered land or estate, to obtain from the registrar a special land certificate for that purpose, shall be extended to a registered proprietor when he shall be desirous of raising money under this act upon the land or estate.

5. The estate in land described in land certificate may be charged by a declaration according to form in schedule hereto, with a principal sum bearing interest thereon for the issue of debentures as hereinafter provided.

Declaration may contain in relation to the property charged any powers, conditions, and provisions to which the charge shall be subject.

Land certificate and declaration to be sent to the registrar, and after registration to remain in his custody, and be within sect. 137 of principal act for inspection and otherwise: provided that no property shall be charged by any declaration with an amount exceeding two-thirds of the valuation thereof, to be made as hereinafter provided.

Registered owner, previously to registration of declaration, to deposit at the office of Land Registry all deeds and evidences of title in his possession or power relating to the property; and also a valuation on oath of the value of the property charged.

6. Declaration to have no other operation as to the property charged than is expressed in this act.

7. At any time or times after registration of declaration, registered owner for time being may issue debentures for loans, and interest in accordance with and within the limit of the declaration in Form (B.) in schedule.

Debentures to be numbered consecutively.

8. Registration of debenture to relate back to date of registration of declaration, and prevail over any title registered in the meantime, except any other registered debenture under same declaration: provided that registration of a judgment, &c., shall prevent registration of debenture until discharge of judgment, or consent.

Debentures issued under same declaration payable without preference. Owner of land to satisfy registrar, by affidavit or otherwise, that no just right of any third person will be injuriously affected by registration of debentures.

9. Debenture may have annexed to it coupons for interest, payable to bearer.

10. A debenture to be within the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113 (Locke King's Act).

11. For purposes of provisions of principal act in relation to indefeasible title, registration, land certificates, or otherwise applicable to an interest, for entry of which in record of title that act makes provision, the ownership of a debenture shall be deemed to be an interest in land.

12. In entering in record of title the ownership of a debenture, sufficient to describe the declaration and specify the number of land certificate without describing the land.

13. A registered owner of a debenture, or his registered executors, administrators, or assigns, may transfer, according to the Form (C.) in the schedule hereto, the debenture, and by such transfer all rights of action and suit, and all benefits under this act and otherwise, which the transferor had in respect of the debenture at the time of the transfer, shall become vested in the transferee to be exercisable in his own name.

14. Debenture or transfer to have no effect against property until registration.

15. Notwithstanding anything in the principal act, the property charged shall not be affected by any trust affecting a debenture, nor shall the registered landowner be affected by any notice whatever of any such trust, nor shall the registrar, either in respect of the registered landowner or a debenture owner, receive any notice, however given, of any such trust: provided that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to take away from the registered owner of, or a beneficiary in, a debenture, or other person interested therein, any right as to restraint of conveyance, caveat, injunction, or otherwise, under the sections numbered 93 to 103 inclusively in the principal act.

16. Discharge of debenture. 87th section of principal act.

17. Satisfaction of debenture by payment into Court of Chancery, under Trustees Relief Act. Order of court and certificate of Accountant-General to be registered.

18. Investment on a debenture to be within trust to invest on real security.

19. Stamps on declarations, debentures, and transfers.

20. On default in payment, the registered owner of debenture may give notice at the address appointed in declaration for payment.

If default continues for seven days, he may give notice to registered owner, and also at Land Office, of intention to apply for liquidator at any time not earlier than fourteen days or later than three months after notice.

21. The Court of Chancery, on application of debenture holder, may appoint a liquidator and a banker; may supply vacancies; and direct remuneration and expenses.

22. The liquidator shall have powers and duties following:—

To take possession of deposited deeds and evidences of title; to inspect and take copies of such other deeds and evidences as owner might inspect or take copies of.

To take possession of the property charged, and to recover and receive the rents and profits thereof.

To let all or any of the property charged for such terms of years, and at such rents, and subject to such covenants, conditions, and agreements, and in such manner as from time to time the liquidator may deem fit.

To make repairs, insure against loss by fire, and to do all other acts necessary or expedient for the proper use and occupation and maintenance of the property charged.

To employ and pay a receiver or manager of the property charged for any of the above-mentioned purposes.

To sell the property charged by public auction or private contract, and either together or in separate parcels, and to buy in the same, or any part thereof, and resell the same, and to make any such sale or resale subject to such conditions of sale, and at such times, and in such manner as liquidator may think fit, and to employ and pay any auctioneer for any of such purposes.

To execute in the name of the liquidator all deeds and instruments which the liquidator may deem necessary for letting or transferring the property charged, and effectually vesting the same in any lessee or purchaser thereof.

To pay all monies arising from the rents and profits, and from the proceeds of any lease or sale of the property charged, on the receipt thereof, to the banker, to a separate account to be kept by the liquidator.

To pay thereout all necessary and proper outgoings and disbursements due and payable in respect of the property charged.

To pay the interest and the principal money due on the registered debentures, without preference or priority, in the manner therein provided.

After paying all outgoings and disbursements, interest and principal due on the debentures, and the salary or remuneration, costs, charges, and expenses to be paid and allowed to the liquidator, to pay the balance in the hands or under the control of the liquidator, and restore any property remaining unsold, and any deeds and evidences of title, and documents relating thereto, remaining in the possession of the liquidator to the registered landowner.

To pay into the Bank of England any money which shall, under the last preceding provision, be applicable in payment of interest or principal due on a registered debenture, and shall be unclaimed for three calendar months after the time when all the principal money due on the debenture shall have become payable by the liquidator, and to make such payment into the Bank of England as a trustee having in his hands such unclaimed money in trust for the person then entitled to it, within the operation of the said act of the 10 & 11 Vict., and the acts of Parliament and General Orders of the Court in relation to that act.

To file in the court a just and true account at the end of every three months, of all moneys received and paid, during that period, by or on account of the liquidator, and of the balance remaining in his hands or under his control.

To appoint a solicitor for any purposes requiring legal advice or assistance, and to pay him such costs as, being allowed on taxation, may be necessary in that behalf.

23. The court may make order, as to any of the above-mentioned powers and duties, that the liquidator shall not exercise the same without the sanction or further direction of the court, and make such orders as it may deem necessary to enforce the due execution of the powers and duties of the liquidator, or otherwise, in relation to the execution thereof.

The court may at any time after an order for the appointment of a liquidator has been made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of the court that all proceedings under the order ought to be stayed, make an order staying the same, either altogether or for a limited time, on such terms and subject to such conditions as it may deem fit.

The court in all proceedings under this act may have regard to the wishes of the registered owners of the debentures, and may, if it thinks fit, direct meetings of them to be summoned, held, presided over, and conducted in such manner as the court may direct, for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes.

24. Operation of liquidator's deeds of lease and conveyance.

25. Orders of court registered at the Land Registry to be evidence.

26. Costs in court.

27. Debenture owner shall not be entitled to any other remedy against property charged than remedy herein provided, but shall be entitled to any remedies to enforce the covenant in the debenture.

28. Notices or matters directed to be given or delivered may be left at or sent by post to the proper address, which, in the case of the registered land owner, or of a registered debenture owner, shall be his address registered at the office of Land Registry for service, and in case of any other person his usual or last known place of business or abode.

A notice by post shall be sent within such time as shall admit of its being delivered in the due course of delivery within the period prescribed for giving the notice.

In proving notice, it shall be sufficient to prove that the notice was properly directed and put into the post.

29. The entries to be made under this act at the office of Land Registry to be made in such books, and in such manner and form, as the registrar may from time to time appoint, but it shall not be necessary to print any instrument or other matter to be made or done under this act.

30. Registrar, &c. not liable to action.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the following gentlemen to be of her Majesty's counsel, learned in the law:—John P. De Gex, Esq.; G. Jessell, Esq.; E. F. Smith, Esq.; Joshua Williams, Esq.

* * * The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.
The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 8, 1865.

THE Report of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the working of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, recommends such material alterations in the law of bankruptcy, that it is hopeless to expect the introduction during the present session of any measure based upon the suggestions of the commissioners; and, indeed, while fully admitting the great defects of the present law, we cannot but think that some of the suggestions in the Report require grave consideration and considerable modification. We will proceed to notice some of the resolutions which appear to us to be of doubtful expediency. Resolutions 5 and 6 recommend that the office of official assignee should be abolished, and that, on adjudication, the property of the bankrupt should remain in his charge, in trust for his creditors, without power of alienation, until the appointment of a trustee, or other special order. This resolution may have been founded upon the evidence of a solicitor of great experience, who, in his examination before the commission of 1854, expressed his belief, "that in very many cases the property might quite as safely be left in the hands of the bankrupt who has been hunted by his creditors previously, as be intrusted, not to the messenger, but to the messenger's man." The same gentleman added, "that he had again and again known a man struggle against bankruptcy, in consequence of the pain he knows his wife and family will endure by the introduction of the messenger's man, than from any publicity which he will have to undergo."

To obviate this occasional hardship on an honest bankrupt, there is a provision in sect. 108 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, which relieves the bankrupt from the presence of the messenger, if the official assignee or the court shall be of opinion that the keeping possession is not requisite for the due protection of the creditors. This is surely a wiser provision than the one suggested by the Report, which leaves every bankrupt, whether honest or fraudulent, in the entire control of his property until the trustee is appointed. It is true, that the next resolution empowers the court of adjudication to order measures to be taken, if necessary, for the safe custody of the property, until the trustee is appointed; but the court will not put itself in motion, and it is matter of experience, that creditors will not exert themselves to protect their own interests. It is not necessary to preserve official assignees in order to secure a bankrupt's property; but it is well worth consideration, whether there should not be some officer of the court of adjudication whose duty it shall be, in the first instance, to take possession of the property, and to retire from possession, in case the court should think keeping possession is not necessary.

Then come the resolutions regarding the appointment of a trustee. The creditors are to meet as soon as possible. We presume they are to be convened by the court of adjudication; and those who have verified their claims are to appoint a trustee, and at the same time appoint two unpaid inspectors from among the creditors, who are to superintend without remuneration, the proceedings of the trustee. This is a suggestion which, we think, will never work well. Unpaid inspectors will, as a general rule, leave everything to the trustee. Human nature does not like to be unpaid for services rendered, and men of business especially are disinclined to work for others gratuitously. To a certain extent the inspectors would be working in protection of their own interests; but if creditors to a large amount, they will probably be fully occupied with their own business, and will not have time to superintend the trustee closely; if creditors to a small amount, they will not think it worth while to do so, and the result will be, that everything will be left to the trustee. The trustee himself is to be paid a reasonable remuneration by the creditors; and where the bankrupt's estate is considerable, it will be well worth their while to appoint an efficient man, and to pay him handsomely. As he is to have power to admit or reject claims, he should be a man competent to decide upon their legality; and in large bankruptcies, it would probably be the practice to appoint a lawyer trustee; but lawyers do not love less than reasonable remuneration, and are wont to put a proper value upon their services; and the risk would be, that in small bankruptcies, where the estate could not afford a competent trustee, there would be great mismanagement of the available assets. One general provision regulating the management of all bankrupts' estates, great and small, appear to us to be inexpedient.

Then comes a resolution that a bankrupt, who has paid 6s. 8d. in the pound to those creditors who have proved under his bankruptcy, shall be freed from all claims capable of proof; that a bankrupt, who has not paid so much in the pound, should be freed at the expiration of six years from the date of his adjudication. This seems to be a very strong measure: there are many cases in which a bankrupt, if he has traded with common caution and care, ought to pay more than a dividend of one-third of his debts; many in which, without any fault on his part, he cannot pay so much—each case should stand on its own merits. Whereas under the resolution, no man who, from whatever causes, is unable to pay the 6s. 8d., can hope to retrieve his fortunes; for the feeling that for six years more he must struggle on to clear himself from past liabilities, will be enough to break down the energies of the most resolute individuals: either there should be a discretionary power in the Court in each case, or the time during which the discharge is delayed should be considerably shortened.

The 22nd and following resolutions propose to make important alterations in the present law as to deeds of arrangement:—

"22. That where a deed is to have the effect of binding creditors who have not executed it, the court in which it is registered should have jurisdiction to determine whether it has been duly executed, or is in other respects valid.

"23. That this jurisdiction should be exercised by the court which would have exercised the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and that every creditor should prove his debt in respect of which the deed is signed, before such deeds shall be binding on any creditor who has not executed it.

"24. That the amount of the debt to be proved should be ascertained in the manner provided in resolution 8 (i. e. deducting the value of securities).

"25. That no deed of assignment should be binding on any creditor who has not executed it unless all the estate and effects of the assignor, which in case of bankruptcy would have vested in the trustees, should have been thereby assigned for equal distribution among the creditors.

"26. That no such deed of composition, assignment, or inspection should discharge the debtor from debts due to creditors who do not execute it, unless all the creditors receive a dividend of at least 6s. 8d. in the pound, or else until six years shall have expired from the date of such deed."

We apprehend that these resolutions would have the effect of removing from the superior courts of common law all jurisdiction over deeds of arrangement. By resolution 22, the court in which the deed is registered shall have jurisdiction to determine upon its validity. Unless this means exclusive jurisdiction, it would make no alteration in the present state of the law. Resolution 23 seems to make the jurisdiction exclusive; and if it does, the result would seem to follow, that every action brought by a creditor to recover his debt must be stayed until the Court of Bankruptcy has decided on the validity or invalidity of the deed.

The 25th resolution proposes to overrule the decisions in equity and in the Exchequer Chamber in Clapham v. Atkinson, that a cessio bonorum is not necessary for the validity of a deed of arrangement; and we think the alteration a most expedient one. It is a hardship upon a creditor who is unwilling to execute the deed. It may be for very good reasons that he should have no security for his composition beyond the promissory note of the debtor, or his covenant to pay by instalments. It may seem expedient that the debtor should in some cases be left in possession of his property, but we believe that the practice has been one of the main causes of discontent with the present bankruptcy law.

Resolution 26 is open to the same objections which resolutions 18 and 19, relating to the discharge of the bankrupt, suggest. Is a creditor to wait for six years to see whether the deed is to be binding on him, or is he to wait, at all events, till it is ascertained whether the debtor will pay 6s. 8d. in the pound?

Resolution 27 proposes to establish "a court of bankruptcy in the metropolis, of which the judges of the superior courts of equity and common law should sit as judges;" and resolution 28 proposes to give an appeal to this court from all orders of a county court, or of a single judge in the metropolis, relating to matters above the value of 20*l.*, and from all other orders when the court or judge shall allow a special case for appeal. And resolution 30 would abolish the metropolitan and district courts of bankruptcy.

Resolution 27, we trust, will never be carried out. People seem to think that the judges of the superior courts have nothing to do, and that it will be quite refreshing to them to provide them with occupation. Whereas, the cry of late years has been for more judges, to keep down the arrears of business, and to perform the varied work which the judges of the superior courts have already conferred upon them. This resolution, coupled with the subsequent ones, which abolishes the present bankruptcy courts, would, in all probability, greatly increase their labours.

Upon the whole, the resolutions of the committee may lead to the changes which the bankruptcy law so urgently requires; but they require considerable modification and alteration. It is to be hoped that the Legislature will speedily apply itself to the subject.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE WORKING OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861, AND TO REPORT THEREON.

(Ordered to be printed the 21st March, 1865).

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee—

Matters prior to Bankruptcy.

That imprisonment of debtors at the suit of the subject to compel the payment of money, under any judgment, decree, or order of any court, should be abolished.

That a creditor, under any judgment, decree, or order, should have the same power of arresting the person of his debtor, who may be about to quit the kingdom, as a creditor now has before judgment, under the act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; and the debtor should be detained in custody until he has either given security or paid the demand, or been discharged in due course of law.

That the power of an execution creditor to enforce the payment of a debt above 50*l.* should be extended to any sum due under any judgment, decree, or order of a court of justice.

Adjudication of Bankruptcy.

That adjudication of bankruptcy should be made by a court in the metropolis, or by a county court.

Proceedings on Adjudication.

That the office of official assignee should be abolished.

That on adjudication the property of the bankrupt should remain in his charge in trust for his creditors, without power of alienation, until the appointment of a trustee, or other special order.

That the court of adjudication should be empowered to order such measures to be taken as may be necessary for the safe custody of the property, and the disposal of it between adjudication and the appointment of a trustee.

That any creditor should only be entitled to vote on proceedings in bankruptcy in respect of the balance due, after deducting the value of all securities for his claim, including bills of exchange, and other obligations, as provided in the Bankruptcy Act of Scotland.

Administration of Assets.

That the creditors should meet as soon as possible after adjudication, and those who have verified their claims should elect a trustee.

That they should, at the same time, elect two or more inspectors from their own body to superintend on their behalf, without remuneration, the proceedings of the trustee.

That the estate of the bankrupt should vest in the trustee on his appointment, and he should possess full power to collect and realise the estate, and distribute it amongst the creditors.

That the trustee should be empowered to admit or reject the claims of any creditor, and any creditor should be at liberty to appeal to the court of adjudication against such decision.

That when an appeal from the rejection of the trustee shall not be made within a reasonable time, the creditor should be finally excluded from the dividend thereupon made, but without prejudice to a proper adjustment of his claim if afterwards admitted at any future dividend.

That the trustee should keep a proper record of the proceedings, and present accounts periodically to the inspectors, and afterwards to the accountant in bankruptcy, shewing the administration of the assets.

That the trustee should give security for the performance of his duty, and be paid a reasonable remuneration, to be fixed by the creditors.

That the court of adjudication should have power, on the application of a creditor or of the trustee, to make the orders necessary to compel a due compliance with the provisions of the bankrupt laws.

That the accountant in bankruptcy should be required to examine all such accounts as the trustee may be required by law to file, and to issue in each case such directions as may be necessary for the due accounting by the trustees. Such directions to be enforced by the court of adjudication.

Discharge of Bankrupt.

That whenever the bankrupt shall have made a full disclosure of his dealings and affairs, and a surrender of all his property to the satisfaction of the court of adjudication, and shall have paid a dividend of 6s. 8d. in the pound to those creditors who have proved their debts under his bankruptcy, he should be freed from all claims capable of proof in the bankruptcy.

That in all other cases in which a bankrupt shall have made a full disclosure of his dealings and affairs, and a surrender of all his property to the satisfaction of the court, he should be freed from all such claims after the expiration of six years from the date of the adjudication.

That the payment by the bankrupt, after the adjudication, to all his creditors who have proved under the bankruptcy, of such an amount as will, together with what is actually paid under the bankruptcy, make up the dividend required by the 18th resolution, should have the same effect as if the whole of such dividend had been paid under the bankruptcy.

Punishment of Bankrupt.

That such wilful acts of debtors tending to delay or injure their creditors as shall be declared by law criminal, should be made punishable only in the ordinary criminal courts of justice.

Administration under Deed.

That where a deed is to have the effect of binding creditors who have not executed it, the court in which it is registered should have jurisdiction to determine whether it has been duly executed, or is in other respects valid.

That this jurisdiction should be exercised by the court which would have exercised the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and every creditor should prove his debt, in respect of which the deed is signed, before such deed shall be deemed binding on any creditor who has not executed it.

That the amount of the debt to be proved should be ascertained in the manner provided in the 8th resolution.

That no deed of assignment should be binding upon any creditor who has not executed it, unless all the estate and effects of the assignor, which in case of bankruptcy would have vested in the trustee, shall have been thereby assigned for equal distribution among the creditors.

That no such deed of composition, assignment, or inspection, should discharge the debtor from debts due to creditors who do not execute it, unless all the creditors receive a dividend of at least 6s. 8d. in the pound, or else until six years shall have expired from the date of such deed.

Courts of Bankruptcy and Officers.

That there should be established a Court of Bankruptcy in the metropolis, and the judges of the superior courts of equity and common law should sit as judges in that court.

That there should be an appeal to the Court of Bankruptcy from all orders of a county court, or of a single judge in the metropolis, relating to matters above the value of 20l., and from all other orders when the court or judge shall allow a special case for appeal.

That there should be a chief accountant, who should supervise the accounts of trustees, and perform such other duties as are provided for in the Bankruptcy Act of Scotland.

That the present Metropolitan and District Courts of Bankruptcy should be abolished as soon as practicable.

Consolidation.

That the bankrupt laws should be amended in the above particulars, and be consolidated.

APPENDIX.

Return of the Deeds registered in the Court of Bankruptcy, and in the Office of the Chief Registrar, during the Months of November and December, 1864; shewing the Amount of Stamp and Ad-valorem Duty paid thereon; the Amount of Property or Composition comprised therein or distributable thereunder; and the Amount of Unsecured Debts above 10l. comprised therein.

Note by the Chairman (Mr. Moffat).

The "amount of estate and effects" exhibits merely the proposed amount of composition, and the debtor's estimate of the value of the assets, upon which assignments are accepted by creditors.

The members of the committee were—The Attorney-General, Mr. Moffat, Mr. Murray, Mr. Malins, Mr. Weguelin, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Crum-Ewing, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Vance, Mr. Cave, Mr. Göschen, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. Tavernor John Miller, Mr. Ayrton, and Mr. Dunlop.

(Mr. Malins did not attend any of the meetings of the committee).

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE WORKING OF THE LAW RELATING TO LETTERS-PATENT FOR INVENTION.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

May it please your Majesty,

WE, the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the working of the Law relating to Patents for Inventions, humbly present to your Majesty the results of our investigation, in this our report.

Our attention was, at the outset, directed to the consideration of those defects in the working of the present system which, since the amendment of the law in the year 1852, had become so generally felt, as to have given occasion for the institution of the present inquiry.

Of these, the most important appear to be the protracted litigation and consequent expense, which in almost every case result from the present mode of trying questions of patent rights. Two instances were stated to us in evidence, in which the law expenses of plaintiff and defendant together amounted to 26,000*l.* and to 15,000*l.* respectively. The course of litigation began in the former case in 1857, and may at the present moment be still further protracted; in the latter it lasted from the year 1842 until 1855. It may be added, that since the Commission met, a single case has occupied the attention of the Court of one of the Vice-Chancellors for upwards of thirty days.

The multiplicity of patents, arising from the facility and diminished cost of obtaining them, has been brought to our notice as another serious cause of complaint against the present law. It appears from the tables compiled at the Great Seal Patent Office, that the average number of provisional protections annually granted is now about 3000, while the patents sealed exceed 2000, and that an increase on this average may be expected. The evil arising from this multiplicity of monopolies is alleged to be of a two-fold nature. In the first place, that of the existence of a number of patents for alleged inventions of a trivial character; in the second place, that of the granting of patents for inventions which are either old or practically useless, and are employed by the patentees only to embarrass rival manufacturers. Thus in either case that monopoly, one of the main grounds of defence of which is the stimulus it offers to invention, obstructs, instead of aiding, the progress and improvement of arts and manufactures.

On the other hand, we have been pressed with the opinion that the cost of obtaining letters-patent, together with the fees payable on their continuance up to the full term of fourteen years, although reduced to 175*l.*, payable by instalments, of which the first does not exceed 25*l.*, is still so high as to be an insuperable bar to the poor inventor in obtaining the protection to which he is fairly entitled.

Again: it is claimed by inventors on the ground of public policy, that the tax imposed on the granting of patents, and thereby indirectly, on inventors, should be no more than sufficient to cover the expenses of the Great Seal Patent Office, and of the necessary libraries and museums connected with it. At the present date, it appears that the accumulation of surplus fees (after allowing for all such expenses), since the year 1852, amounts to more than 200,000*l.*, and that for future years the annual surplus upon the present footing may be estimated at 40,000*l.*

With such considerations before us, and knowing that from the nature of the subject the remedies suggested would vary within very wide limits, we determined, as the basis of our inquiry, to draw up a series of questions which should invite suggestions upon those points of the present system where amendment seemed to be required.

The following questions, while they formed to some extent, the groundwork of our oral examinations, have been widely circulated among the chambers of commerce in the principal cities and towns of this kingdom, and have been submitted to such other societies and persons as seemed to us to be likely to afford assistance in investigating the subject before us:—

1. Should the cost of obtaining letters-patent be diminished, or increased; if either, to what extent; and should the payment be made in one sum, or by annual, or other instalments?
2. Does the present mode of obtaining payments appear to you satisfactory? Is it your opinion that there ought to be a preliminary investigation of a more searching character than that which at present takes place? If so, how should the tribunal be constituted before which such investigation shall be conducted, and should the judgment of such tribunal be final?
3. Should the investigation be ex parte or public, and subject to opposition? Should the present practice as to caveats be adhered to?
4. Have you reason to suppose that public inconvenience is caused by the multiplicity of patents?
5. Do you consider that patents ought to be refused on the ground of the trifling and frivolous nature of the inventions for which they are claimed?
6. Should greater facilities be provided for the repeal of invalid patents?
7. Do you consider that any change should be made in the tribunal appointed to try actions and suits instituted by patentees?
8. Should the granting of licenses, in your opinion, be made compulsory, and can you suggest any practicable method by which this should be done?
9. Do you think it expedient that patents should be granted to importers of foreign inventions?
10. Do you think it expedient that patents should be granted to foreigners residing abroad, or to their nominees?
11. Is it expedient to make any, and if so, what, alteration in the law relating to prolongations and confirmations?
12. Is it expedient to make any, and if so, what, alteration in the law respecting disclaimers and memoranda of alterations?

We have thought it most convenient, in considering the evidence before us, to arrange it under the following heads:—

I. A statement of the successive stages of procedure in applying for the grant of letters-patent; of the fees payable at each stage, and during the continuance of the term of fourteen years; and of the procedure on disclaimers, memoranda of alterations, confirmations, and prolongations.

II. Opinions on the question, whether it is or not expedient that patents should be easily and cheaply granted.

III. Objections to the present mode of trying cases of patent rights, and alterations which may be suggested.

IV. The various opinions on the working of the system, as regards disclaimers, memoranda of alterations, confirmations, and prolongations, and on the propriety of granting patents to importers of foreign inventions, and to foreign inventors.

The evidence on these latter branches of our inquiry, as well oral as written, may be classified under three general heads:—First, that of judges and members of the legal profession more especially acquainted with this branch of the law, and of the gentlemen officially engaged in the working of the present system; secondly, that of patent agents; thirdly, that of engineers and manufacturers, many of whom represent in their own persons the conflicting interests of the inventor and of the user of inventions.

I.

The following table shews the general results of applications for patents under the present system, from its commencement, on the 1st October, 1852, to the end of the year 1863:—

The first step on the application for letters-patent is, to lodge at the Great Seal Patent Office the petition, which discloses only the title of the invention; the provisional specification, "describing the nature of the invention," and a solemn declaration by the applicant that he believes himself to be the true and first inventor. These documents are referred to one or other of the law officers of the Crown, whose duty goes no further than to decide whether or not the nature of the invention is sufficiently described by the provisional specification. By sect. 8 of the Patent-law Amendment Act, 1852, the law officer is at liberty to call, in aid of his decision, mechanical or scientific assistance, and to order the payment of such fees as he may think fit to the persons so called in. This power is, however, only occasionally exercised. The law officer, upon being satisfied of the sufficiency of the provisional specification, grants his certificate, allowing provisional protection. The granting of the certificate is then advertised in the London Gazette, and in the Journal of the Commissioners of Patents.

This investigation before the law officer may, however, be avoided by lodging, in the first instance, a complete specification, "particularly describing the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed;" in this case the certificate issues as of course.

Within four months from the date of his application, notice must be given by the applicant of his intention to proceed with his patent; advertisements of this intention, stating nothing more than the title of the patent, are then officially issued, and a period of twenty-one days is allowed, within which objections to the grant may be lodged at the Great Seal Patent Office. The case between the applicant and the objector is then heard by the law officer, the parties usually appearing separately, the provisional specification being in practice regarded as a secret document. When, however, from the mode of conducting the opposition, the law officer finds that the nature of the new invention has become known to the opponent, he sometimes uses his discretionary power of hearing the parties in the presence of one another.

Cases have sometimes occurred in which the law officer has refused his fiat, on the general ground of want of novelty. This, however, has only been where it was brought to his knowledge that the invention claimed was clearly not new. For from the fact that no appeal lies from his refusal of the fiat, the inclination has always been to grant the application where a fair doubt exists.

The applicant, if successful upon this hearing, obtains from the law officer his fiat for the warrant; but the objector has still a right (by entering a caveat at the Great Seal Patent Office) to appeal to the Lord Chancellor against the issue of the fiat.

The next stage is the application for sealing the letters-patent, which must be made within three months from the date of the warrant. Here there is again an opportunity of opposing the grant. Notice of objection must be lodged, as at the former stage, and the parties are then heard before the Lord Chancellor, who has the power (occasionally, though not often, exercised) of referring the matter to the law officer for his opinion. The decision of the Lord Chancellor is, in any case, final; the patent, if successful, being sealed and dated as of the date of application.

The following is a table of the fees payable up to the grant of letters-patent:—

On lodging petition	£5
For certificate of notice to proceed	5
On warrant	5
On sealing	5
On specification	5
Total	£25

In accordance with the rule that the provisional protection lasts for six months only from the date of application, or for such further time as the Lord Chancellor may, upon petition of the applicant, in his discretion, allow, the complete specification must be filed within that period, or within such further time as may have been allowed. If this be not done, the protection ceases, and the grant, if made, becomes void.

In order to maintain the validity of the grant, the patentee must, before the end of three years from the date, pay an additional sum of 50*l.*; and before the end of seven years, the further sum of 100*l.*; thus making the whole cost in fees 175*l.* About two thirds of the patents granted become void at the expiration of the third year, for non-payment of the fee of 50*l.*, and less than one-tenth are continued beyond the seventh year.

The mode of obtaining the repeal of letters-patent is by writ of scire facias. Since the alteration of the practice in 1852, by which the patentee was allowed the right of replying, this mode of proceeding, at no time common, has fallen into disuse, as will be seen by the following table:—

Number of patents repealed by scire facias from 1617 to October, 1852	19
Number of patents repealed by scire facias from October, 1852, to December, 1861 - None.

The patentee may at any time during the continuance of his grant, by petition to the commissioners of patents, apply for leave to disclaim a part of the title or of the specification of his patent, or to alter either of them, but so that neither disclaimer nor alteration shall extend the exclusive right. The matter is then referred to the law officer, and on his fiat the disclaimer or memorandum of alteration is filed at the Great Seal Patent Office, with specification. Annexed is a table shewing the number of these applications inrolled during the last eleven years:—

Number of Disclaimers and Memoranda of Alterations filed during the last Twelve Years.

In cases where subsequently to the taking out of a patent, it is discovered by the patentee that some part of the invention for which such patent is claimed already exists in a printed form, but having long escaped public notice, has become obsolete; and where a rediscovery by the patentee has taken place, application may be made to the Judicial Committee for confirmation of the patent, notwithstanding want of novelty in the invention for which it is claimed.

The same mode of procedure is followed for the purpose of obtaining prolongation of the full term of fourteen years, the Judicial Committee having power to recommend to your Majesty the extension of the original term for a further period of fourteen years. The usual length of time of extensions, however, is not more than from three to six years. Advertisements of the application for prolongation are inserted in certain local and metropolitan newspapers, and objections are taken by entering a caveat. The objector must lodge his grounds for opposition in writing, and may appear at the hearing of the application in support of them. In all cases the law officer attends at this hearing to watch the case on the part of the public, and has a right to take part in opposition to the extension.

Three general rules may be laid down, by which the Judicial Committee have been guided in recommending prolongations. The patentee must shew, first, that the invention is of great ingenuity and merit; secondly, that it is of considerable public utility; thirdly, that, in spite of his reasonable exertions to promote the invention, the remuneration he has received from it is inadequate.

The following table shews the number of confirmations and prolongations applied for, and granted from, the year 1835 to 1862:—

II.

On the question whether patents should be made easy or difficult to obtain, we find a division of opinion; some witnesses denying, others affirming, the existence of public inconvenience from an indefinite multiplication of these temporary monopolies.

In the opinion of the former class, such inconvenience either does not exist at all, or, if it is any slight degree felt, is so exceptional as to require no special legislation. They maintain that, as a rule, patents which are either frivolous in their character, or questionable on the ground of want of novelty, are not supported by the patentee when exposed to the test of payment for renewal, or of the expense of litigation. They contend, that without the protection given by a patent, many inventions, useful in character, though not of primary importance, would either not be made, or, being made, would remain undivulged; that to decide beforehand with certainty on the value or worthlessness of an invention is seldom possible; and that the evil remedies itself, inasmuch as worthless patents are seldom continued beyond the period of three years.

The majority of witnesses, however, decidedly affirm the existence of practical inconvenience from the multiplicity of patents. It is clear, that patents are granted for matters which can hardly be considered as coming within the definition in the Statute of Monopolies, of "a new manufacture." It is in evidence, that the existence of these monopolies embarrasses the trade of a considerable class of persons, artisans, small tradesmen, and others, who cannot afford to face the expense of litigation, however weak the case against them may seem to be; and a still stronger case is made out as to the existence of what may be called obstructive patents, and as to the inconvenience caused thereby to manufacturers directly, and through them to the public.

From a paper drawn up at our request by the superintendent of specifications, it appears, that upon examining into the first 100 applications for patents in each of the years 1855, 1858, 1862, the results were, in his opinion, that in 1825, 26 were manifestly bad for want of novelty, and 6 more partly so; in 1858, 14 manifestly old, and 1 partly so; in 1862, 7 were old, and 1 would probably turn out to be so. An instance, illustrating the mode in which these patents are used, is given in evidence, where royalties had been demanded, and in most cases obtained, by the patentee of a machine, which turned out, upon investigation, to be identical with one which nineteen years before had been well known and publicly used.

Other instances will be found in the evidence of particular manufactures and branches of invention which are so blocked up by patents, that not only are inventors deterred from taking them up with a view to improvement, but the manufacturer, in carrying on his regular course of trade, is hampered by owners of worthless patents, whom it is generally more convenient to buy off than to resist. The evil also results in another practice having the same obstructive tendency, namely, that of combination amongst a number of persons of the same trade to buy up all the patents relating to it, and to pay the expense of attacking subsequent improvers out of a common fund. From a comparison of evidence, it cannot be doubted that this practice prevails to a considerable extent. We must also conclude, that when the obstruction is not to be got rid of without the expense and annoyance of litigation, in a large majority of cases the manufacturer submits to an exaction, rather than incur the alternative.

We desire to call special attention to the evidence given by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and by various witnesses on behalf of the War Department, shewing the embarrassment which has been caused to the naval and military services by the multitude of patents taken out for inventions in use in those departments. It appears to us necessary for the public service, that for the future no patent should be granted without the insertion of a proviso allowing to the Crown the unrestricted use of the invention therein patented, the compensation for such use to be fixed by the Treasury.

Having in view the several opinions thus shortly adverted to, we have to consider the evidence:—

1. As to the cost of obtaining and renewing letters-patent, and as to the mode of payment.

Notwithstanding the prevalence of an opinion, that patents may be, and are unduly, multiplied, a very small minority is in favour of increasing the cost of obtaining them. Of those who have given evidence in this sense, some object altogether to the granting of patent rights, and therefore consistently desire that, if not abolished, they should be reduced in number by any practicable method; others contend that the mere fact of having a larger payment to make, would render projectors more careful not to incur expense on behalf of inventions of doubtful utility and novelty. Many witnesses think that the scale of payment was, on the revision of the law in 1852, fixed too low, but do not consider that it could now be prudently raised.

Objection is taken by a third class of witnesses, to the payments of 50*l.* and 100*l.* on the renewal of the patent at the end of the third and seventh years respectively. It is alleged, that the periods of payment are fixed too early in the duration of the monopoly; that many valuable patents have, even in their seventh year, failed to become profitable, from the difficulty of inducing manufacturers to adopt new methods of working, and that in such cases the patentee is either unable to procure the necessary sum, or is unwilling to risk the additional expense, and therefore allows his patent to drop; that thus the system inflicts a hardship on the inventor, and retards the general progress of improvement. Several modifications of the law are proposed; one alternative being to reduce these payments, another to postpone them till the end of the fifth and ninth years respectively. It is also suggested, that some inconvenience arises from the fact, that on non-payment of the renewal fees the patent becomes at once void, and that much of the hardship complained of would be obviated, if the Lord Chancellor were empowered to allow the continuance of the patent, on payment being made, though after the proper time, provided the patentee were able to prove that the delay had arisen from accident, or from a mistake not involving gross negligence.

Among the engineering and manufacturing class, there seems to be some inclination to urge the adoption of a system of annual payments, on the ground that the burthen would thus be more equally distributed over the whole period of the patent, and that the rich and the poor inventor would thereby be brought upon more equal terms, while there would be a constant tendency on the part of patentees to allow an unremunerative patent to drop at once.

The propriety of a system of annual payments is, however, denied by the greater number of those who have given evidence before us, who rely on their experience of the difficulty that is now constantly found in getting patentees to insure the renewal of their patents by the necessary formalities; they maintain, that this difficulty would be the source of still greater evil, if the same process had to be gone through from year to year.

Whatever be the scale of payment adopted, we find a very general expression of opinion, that the price to be paid by inventors, in the aggregate, should not be more than sufficient to provide for the expenses of the patent office, library, and museum; and that these should be maintained in the highest state of efficiency, so as to give inventors the utmost facility for ascertaining the status of every branch of invention.

PRIVATE BILLS COSTS BILL.

The report of amendments in this bill was agreed to.

Lord Redesdale proposed a new clause, the object of which was to make the amount deposited with a private bill a lien for costs.

Lord Stanley of Alderley opposed the clause. The money deposited with a private bill was deposited as a security that the proposed works would be executed. Besides, to require money to be deposited as security for costs was an entirely novel principle, for it was one not adopted even in the courts of law.

Lord Houghton observed, that though the clause might be a good one, it was not germane to this bill, and, if adopted, might imperil the measure.

The Marquis of Bath said it was well understood that the money deposited with a private bill was no real security for the execution of the works.

The Lord Chancellor thought that the proposition would not operate unreasonably if the bill happened to be rejected; but if the bill passed it would be open to objection that a lien on the deposits should be given.

Lord Redesdale said, that he would bring up a clause, the operation of which should be limited to those cases in which a bill was lost.

The report was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, March 30.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE) BILL.

On the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on going into committee on this bill,

The Attorney-General presented a petition from the Masters of the Bench of the Hon. Society of Lincoln's-inn, praying that if the courts of law and equity were to be concentrated, no change might be made from the site proposed in the bill before the House.

Mr. Lygon said, no opportunity had yet been afforded for considering whether the Thames Embankment would or would not present the proper site for the concentration of the new courts of justice. The only two sites hitherto proposed were, the Carey-street site, which was adopted by the Government, and the Lincoln's-inn-fields site. The Carey-street site was estimated in 1861 to cost 78,000*l.*, and he apprehended that its value had not in any degree diminished since then. He did not find that the select committee to which that bill had been referred had given any precise estimate of the expenditure, but he would assume that the estimate of 1861—viz. 678,000*l.* for the site alone—was accurate. The next point to be considered was, whether that site would be sufficient. Now, the evidence of Mr. Pennethorne, the architect of the Board of Works, who was called as a witness by the promoters of the bill, shewed that several very important courts remained unprovided for by the measure. These were the Central Criminal Court and the Bankruptcy Court, and there was no provision in the plan for a court in which all the twelve judges should assemble, similar to the present Exchequer Chamber; and Mr. Pennethorne admitted that his plan was so made as to occupy the whole available space, and that if another judge were appointed equivalent in rank to a Vice-Chancellor, and as chief judge in bankruptcy, accommodation could only be found for him by removing some of the offices up stairs. Now, since the commission had sat, and since the committee of 1861 examined this subject, another site had been opened which, at all events, deserved consideration; and, further, the Carey-street site would be difficult of access. The Strand was choked up with traffic, and although it might be said that the Thames Embankment would relieve the Strand, yet they knew that the more facilities were offered for the traffic of the metropolis the more that traffic was found to develop itself. The traffic along the New-road had in no degree been diminished in consequence of the opening of the Metropolitan Railway. At the Thames Embankment they had the most perfect means of access on all sides. Some persons thought an excellent site would be available in the immediate neighbourhood of Westminster-bridge; others preferred the neighbourhood of Fife-house, where a very large tract of land would remain at the disposal of the public. He moved, as an amendment, that the bill be recommitted to the former committee, and that they be instructed to inquire into capabilities of the Thames Embankment as a site for the proposed buildings.

Sir J. Shelley seconded the amendment.

Sir H. Cairns believed he expressed the opinion of the great mass of honourable members present, as well as his own, in recommending the Government not to accede to the amendment, which would defeat the measure for the present session. He had not heard what were the reasons of greater convenience to the public on which the proposal of the Thames Embankment site rested. No doubt it would be a fine thing to have the ornamental façade of the Palace of Justice fronting the river. Could there be a doubt as to what would be most convenient to the public? but who were the lawyers on this question? They were the great body of solicitors of London, who transact not only the legal business of London, but the legal business of the whole kingdom; and they prefer the Carey-street site, because on all sides in the immediate neighbourhood north of that locality they have their offices, and they could not get the same accommodation elsewhere. Then, on the south side of the Carey-street site was the Temple, where the barristers said the very same thing. Carey-street, then, stands exactly in the centre of these two localities, and would obviously be most suitable as a site for the proposed courts. The arrangement did not include the Central Criminal Court in this Palace of Justice. When you get criminal courts you must have the gaols in immediate connexion with them. To bring prisoners to the centre, where the civil business of the country is transacted, would be extremely inconvenient. As to the Exchequer Chamber, all conversant with the detailed arrangements, know that it is composed of the justices of any two of the three superior Courts of Common Law; and when the time for their sitting comes—on very few days in the year—there must of necessity be a resession of the business of the two justices' own courts, either of which would be available, pro hac vice, for the Exchequer Chamber. So there is no arrangement for the Bankruptcy Court. Now the registrars and accountants being connected with the mere administrative and financial details of bankruptcy, their presence would be unsuitable in the Palace of Justice; but if any judicial business is to be transacted by a judge in bankruptcy or by a judge of appeal, accommodation would easily be found for business of that kind. With reference to access, any one who knows the sort of people who go to courts of justice, know perfectly well that there is very little crowding of carriages about them. The erection of the new courts would not cause any great addition to the traffic of the Strand, but if it should prove otherwise, one of the great advantages of the Carey-street site is, that you have two parallel lines of access—one at the north and the other at the south; and if it should appear that there is not width enough for the Strand and Carey-street, it would be very easy, in pulling down houses in Carey-street, to add a few feet to the width of the roadway, and thus give as much access as could be required. He believed the site chosen was the best that could be selected, and in saying this he was satisfied he spoke the opinion of all those engaged in legal pursuits. He did not think a single valid objection has been urged against it.

Mr. H. Seymour supported the amendment.

Mr. Malins earnestly opposed the amendment.

Mr. Cowper expressed his opinion that an unfair use had been made of Mr. Pennethorne's evidence. From the year 1860, every one appeared to agree that seven acres and a half would be amply sufficient for the new courts, and in that opinion Mr. Pennethorne himself concurred. He distinctly stated that when called before the committee he did nothing more than shew that the site was sufficient. Supposing for a moment that the courts of law could not be properly accommodated on the ground floor, nothing could be easier than to double the accommodation by placing some of the courts on the first floor. He believed that even without this increase, which could be easily made, five acres and a half would be found amply sufficient, not only for the present but also for future requirements. The site itself was also not limited, because additional property in the immediate neighbourhood could easily be purchased. A large number of petitions were presented in its favour, and only three against—the latter merely asking for certain alterations in the clauses. He had at first thought that from its natural features, the fine buildings about it, and the proximity of the river, the embankment would be a desirable site. Having introduced the Embankment Bill, too, he naturally felt desirous that the locality should receive due consideration. After fully reflecting upon the matter, however, he felt that it would be totally impossible to place the courts of justice upon the embankment. If erected between Somerset-house and the Temple the new courts could not be built in advance of their line of frontage, because if such a course were adopted the appearance of Somerset-house and the Temple would be utterly ruined. They would, therefore, have to be erected upon that portion of the Strand between Somerset-house and the Temple, on which there stood at this moment the best houses to be found in that part of the town. He believed, however, that by choosing this site, a great sacrifice both of convenience and money would be incurred simply for the purpose of procuring additional beauty and ornament. It was obvious that, by adopting this site, the chief purpose for which it was proposed to incur this expenditure would be frustrated. The concentration, which they so much desired, could only be obtained by the selection of a site in the immediate neighbourhood of the Inns of Court, the chambers of counsel, and the offices of solicitors. As all the Inns of Court, with the exception of the Temple, were situated on the north of the Strand, the access to the new courts, if erected between Somerset-house and the Temple, would be extremely inconvenient for Gray's Inn and Lincoln's Inn. Barristers from the latter Inn especially would have to make their way through the tangled maze of courts and alleys which by the present bill were to be swept away to make room for these new courts. The inconvenience consequent upon the distance from the chambers of counsel would fall mostly upon the suitors. The chief difference, however, between the two sites, was one of cost. The Carey-street site was at present occupied by wretched and unhealthy buildings, while that on the south side of the Strand would, from the very nature of the buildings which covered it, be extremely expensive. A competent authority had estimated the compensation in the latter case at about double what would be required in the case of Carey-street.

Mr. A. Mills and Mr. Crauford also opposed, and the amendment was negatived without a division.

The House then went into committee.

Upon clause 2,

Sir W. Jolliffe hoped that care would be taken to acquire sufficient land to insure proper access to the new courts, and that there would not be the same necessity as had arisen in the case of the new foreign office, of purchasing additional land to provide proper approaches. It was bad policy, first, by the outlay of public money, to increase fourfold the value of surrounding property, and then to purchase at that enhanced value.

Mr. Cowper said that every care would be taken to make proper approaches; and he thought he might venture to state, that there would be good access to the new courts on all sides of the building.

The remaining clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

On the order for going into committee upon the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill,

The Attorney-General, after a comprehensive review of the Irish Chancery system, and of the schemes suggested for its reform, gave an exposition of the scheme proposed in this bill, as regarded the constitution of the court and the modes of procedure, which were made to approximate to those of the English court, and pointed out the differences between this bill and the two bills introduced by Mr. Whiteside (which stood for committee upon the orders for that evening), entering at much length and with great minuteness into the technicalities of equity procedure.

Mr. Whiteside, in a speech of equal length and minuteness of detail, condemned the Government measure. He objected to the mixing up in a single bill two matters entirely distinct—the constitution of the court and the procedure. He complained of the costly machinery of the bill, which would greatly enhance the expense of Chancery proceedings in a poor country, while the proposed constitution of the court would inflict a heavy burthen upon the public. He entered very fully into the grounds upon which his own bills were founded—the one containing a scheme for a new constitution of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, the other proposing a reform of its procedure; and he moved, by way of amendment, that this bill be referred to a select committee, to which he proposed that his own bills should be referred; the committee to be empowered to take evidence.

Sir C. O'Loughlin opposed this amendment. No subject, he observed, had received more consideration than that of Chancery reform in Ireland. Ample evidence was before the House, which was perfectly competent to deal with it. He replied briefly to Mr. Whiteside.

Mr. George supported the amendment, observing that the scheme in the bill before the House was opposed to the opinion of Irish Chancery judges, and that it would cause an additional expense of 12,500*l.* a year.

Mr. Scully remarked, that the commissioners, upon whose report the bill was founded, had overlooked a very important subject referred to them, the reduction of costs to suitors. He saw no use in sending the bill to a select committee, except in regard to this point, as to which the House had no materials.

Mr. Walpole pointed out what he regarded as defects in principle in the Chancery reforms. The question was, how should they be dealt with? The Attorney-General proposed to deal with them in a committee of the whole House, and Mr. Whiteside in a select committee. If time permitted he should prefer the latter mode.

Mr. Malins said he should vote for the Government bill, and recommended Mr. Whiteside not to persevere in his motion to refer it to a select committee, but to endeavour to amalgamate his bills with that of the Government.

Sir H. Cairns would be quite satisfied to let the details of the bill be considered in a committee of the whole House.

After some observations by Sir G. Bowyer, and a reply by The Attorney-General, upon a division the amendment was negatived by 68 to 30, and the House went into committee pro forma.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 15, 1866.

THE rapid growth and extension of works to be carried, under the powers of an act of Parliament, through great cities and trading districts, has given rise to a controversy of no ordinary importance to the trading community, on the one hand, and companies engaged in such undertakings, on the other; the question being, whether companies are liable to make compensation to individuals for loss of trade caused to them by the temporary obstruction of public streets and thoroughfares, in the execution of such works. The Courts of Exchequer, Common Pleas, and Queen's Bench, decided that companies were liable to make compensation in such cases, and the decisions to that effect were for a time accepted by that portion of the public whom they concerned; as conclusive, and were extensively acted upon. It appears, however, that the law was by no means settled by these decisions, the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber having overruled them, and held that a company is under no liability whatever to make compensation to any individual simply for the loss caused to his trade or business by the obstruction of a public street or thoroughfare, in the execution of their works under the powers of an act of Parliament. Senior v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, in the Exchequer; Cameron v. The Charing-cross Railway Company, in the Common Pleas; and Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, in the Queen's Bench, having been overruled by Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, in the Exchequer Chamber (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 260), and by Cameron v. The Charing-cross Railway Company (Id. 282). We understand that the case is to be brought for final decision before the House of Lords.

The question arose on the clauses as to compensation in the Consolidation Acts, the Lands Clauses, sect. 68, and the Railways Clauses, sect. 6, by which a party is entitled to compensation "in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for, or injuriously affected by, the execution of the works;" and the first step appears to have been to place some well-defined legal limit to the words "injuriously affected;" to draw a boundary line, beyond which claims for compensation should not be permitted to travel; and the Courts came to the conclusion, that the words "injuriously affected" must be confined to cases for which an action could have been maintained by the party injured had there been no statute authorising the works to be done; that whatever amount of damage a party may sustain from the execution of the works, his case is without remedy, unless he can shew that he would have had a right of action for some injury in respect of land, or an interest in land, but for the existence of the statutory powers under which the injury is inflicted. The rule seems to be well founded; since with reference to compensation, the Legislature is considered as neither taking away existing rights nor conferring new ones. There seems to be no difference of opinion whatever between the Courts below and the Court of Exchequer Chamber as to the rule, that to bring the case within the compensation clauses, the claim must be one for which, but for the act authorising the works, an action would have lain. That rule is adopted throughout. The difference is on other grounds, viz. whether, in the case put, an action would have lain at all? and whether, if it would have lain, the injury was an injury to an interest in land, or a personal injury only? In Senior v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, compensation was claimed for loss of trade occasioned by the obstruction of a highway during the execution of the works of a railway company; and Mr. Baron Bramwell stated that he always understood the principle of the cases to be, that where premises are damaged, under such circumstances that, but for the parliamentary powers, an action would be maintainable against the company, the party interested in the premises was entitled to compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and applying that test, he was of opinion that it was an injurious affecting of premises to obstruct the access to them, so that the business could not be carried on so profitably. And in Cameron v. The Charing-cross Railway Company (16 C. B., N. S., 447), Mr. Justice Willes expressed his opinion as follows:—"Damage to a man's interest in land necessarily includes damage to the business which he carries on upon the land, by diverting it from its accustomed channel. Such an interest is not merely personal; it is an interest which a man enjoys in respect of the land, a reasonable expectation of profit from the exercise of his abilities in some particular place, by carrying on business there. That reasonable expectation is commonly called 'goodwill,' and is a marketable thing. I must confess I do not see why a man should not recover damages for being deprived of that. This is nothing more than is to be found in Comyn's Digest, 'Action upon the Case for a Nuisance' (C.), where it is said, with some doubt, that an action will lie, if, 'by stopping the highway, a man is constrained to use a longer or more difficult way (Dan. 173), or if, by stopping the way, the sale of his coals is hindered in an adjacent colliery.' If he had said that buyers were prevented from coming, it seems to have been agreed that the action would lie. The case (Ivern v. Moir, 1 Salk. 15; 1 Ld. Raym. 486; Holt's Com. 58; 12 Mod. 262; Carth. 451; Comb. 480; Willes, 74a) is so explained in Chamberlain v. The West of London and Crystal Palace Company (2 B. & S. 605), where the matter was thoroughly considered. Then, if an action could have lain for this injury against a person doing it without the sanction of an act of Parliament, the party injured is entitled to claim compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act." The judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in the Exchequer Chamber, in Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, delivered by Chief Justice Erle, confirms the rule, that it is the foundation of a claim for compensation that an action would have lain. "We assume it to be clear, that there is no title to compensation under the statutes for an obstruction, unless without the statutes an action would have lain for the obstruction and the special damage, according to the case In re Penny and The South-eastern Railway Company (7 El. & Bl. 660; S. C., 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 957; 11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 260). The judgment then proceeds to the consideration, first, whether the facts shew that an action would have lain; and, secondly, whether, if an action would have lain, it would have been for an injury to an interest in land; and the conclusion arrived at is, that neither would any action have lain for the injury complained of, viz. loss of custom to a public-house through the access thereto having been rendered less convenient by the obstruction; nor, if the action would have lain, did the damage accrue to the plaintiff in his capacity as owner of an estate in land; nor was any interest in land injuriously affected. Starting with the proposition, that an action lies where the exercise of the right of way by or on behalf of the plaintiff has been obstructed, and a greater damage has been caused to him thereby than is caused to the Queen's subjects in general, by obstructing them in the exercise of their right, the Court of Error held, after an elaborate discussion of cases and principles, that the plaintiff would have had no right of action, because he was not obstructed in the exercise of any right vested in him, and that the damage was not a direct and immediate consequence of the obstruction complained of, and there had been no obstruction to the exercise of a right of way by or on behalf of the plaintiff; neither he himself, nor any one standing in the relation to him, such as servant, agent, tenant, or any other legal relation which gave to the plaintiff a legal interest in his use of the way having been obstructed, but some unknown travellers having chosen some other path, and the plaintiff having no manner of legal right in the choice they made, either as to the path they took, or as to their refreshment at the public-house of which he was the lessee and proprietor. And it was further observed, that the common law limited the remedy for obstructions to public rights to indictment, unless there was special damage, to prevent innumerable actions; and that the same reason applied in full force to prevent innumerable claims on account of an alleged loss of profit caused by obstructions to a public thoroughfare.

The question, therefore, that seems reserved for the House of Lords finally to adjudicate upon, is, whether an action will lie at common law by the tenant or owner of land or houses, where such an obstruction of a public highway renders his house more difficult of access, so as to discourage customers from coming to the house for the purposes of trade. Access to land is, undoubtedly, a right incident to it, on which its value mainly depends, and it would seem like a damage to land if its value was really diminished. A house of good access might let for twice the rent of one of bad access; and in the case of an obstruction made, as a purely illegal act, there is nothing very apparent why the man who is damaged in the value of the land, should not have an action against the wrongdoer for driving away his customers. The Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber has held that he has none, upon the ground apparently that the damage is too remote, by diverting from the house persons and strangers unknown, though if himself, or a servant or agent, or any one else connected with him by contract were hindered, an action would lie. The distinction does not seem at all to take account of the fact, that in both cases alike a man has suffered damage in the value of his property from the purely illegal act of a third person. It is true, that in the case of an injury caused to all the Queen's subjects, the remedy is by indictment; and it would seem, that what at common law would be remedied by indictment, is a proper subject for opposition to the bill before the committees of the Houses of Parliament, but, in the present case, there is an exceptional injury to the individual who has his land lowered in value. The public will wait with anxiety the final determination by the House of Lords of this important matter.

Reviews.

*On the Report of the Patent Law Commissioners. By ROBERT WILSON.

THE most important points in the recommendations of the Patent Law Commissioners are—1. That, without investigating the merits of the invention for which a patent is claimed, the law officers of the Crown should cause a careful inquiry to be instituted, as to whether there has been any previous "documentary publication of the invention, either by grant of letters-patent or otherwise," which publication would be a ground of refusal, subject to appeal to the Lord Chancellor. By "otherwise," we presume, is meant publication in any printed book at home or abroad, or in any foreign record.

2. That the validity of a patent should, in case of a dispute, be tried before a judge, with the aid of scientific assessors chosen by him, but without a jury, unless at the desire of both parties to the proceeding.

3. That patents ought not to be granted for inventions imported from abroad.

4. That no extension of the original period of fourteen years should be allowed.

Mr. Hindmarch, one of the commissioners, concurring in some, but not in all, of the recommendations contained in the report of the other commissioners, and thinking that the law might be amended in other particulars, presented a separate report. In that he gave the following reasons against an official investigation of the novelty of an invention:—

"It appears to me that any official inquiry into the novelty of an invention sought to be made the subject of a patent must necessarily be incomplete and unsatisfactory. To institute such an inquiry, even in an imperfect manner, would occasion a considerable amount of expense to the public, and I think it better to adhere to the present practice, under which the responsibility of inquiry into the novelty of an invention sought to be patented is thrown upon the applicant who alleges his invention to be new."

Mr. Hindmarch also dissents from the proposal to deprive the Privy Council of their jurisdiction to extend the term of letters-patent. But, perhaps, the most practically important recommendation in his report relates to patent agents, who are not at present subject to the control of any court or other authority, and of whom many now in practice are a curse to the community. The remedy, of course, is to subject all persons desirous of practising as patent agents to a preliminary examination, to require them to take out an annual certificate, and to place them under the control of the Court of Chancery. As the certificate would fairly be taxable, this proposition may be favourably entertained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Whatever is said on the subject of patent law or practice by the able and experienced senior member of the firm of Wilson, Bristows, & Carpmael, must be deserving of respectful attention. The main subject of his paper is the question, whether there should be a preliminary investigation as to novelty and merits, or either; and he concludes in favour of such an investigation on both points. The great evil of the present system of granting patents for every invention, however trivial, if it be an invention, is thus illustrated:—

"Whether to ascertain the presence of merit before granting the patent, was justly treated by the commissioners as a chief question of patent law reform:—

"Have you," said Lord Stanley to Sir Francis Crossley (1549), 'considered the question, whether there ought to be a preliminary inquiry before the granting of patents, in order to prevent a multiplication of useless or frivolous patents?'

"I think," said the witness, 'that it would be very difficult for any one appointed by the Government to decide what is a frivolous patent. I believe that a patent was taken out for simply putting India-rubber at the end of a glove, so as to make it tight round the wrist; that might have been considered a frivolous patent, but I believe it was thought to be a very good one in the trade, and it was new and useful.'

"Profitable I dare say it was; but an objector might plausibly ask what the patentee had done to entitle himself to a fourteen years' monopoly. He had made a convenient sort of glove, likely to be well received by the public; being first on the field he had the prestige of introducing it; and he might fairly claim protection in the use of any distinctive name which he might think fit to give to it. But why was the free-trading of the public to be suspended for fourteen years in favour of a scrap of India-rubber in the wrist of a glove? Would the use of India-rubber in gloves have been prevented or postponed by withholding the monopoly? Scarcely so; for if the new glove was saleable, there was nothing to prevent its being made and sold without the monopoly.

"India-rubber had been put into braces, trousers, drawers, waistcoats, boots, clogs, and pretty well every other article of civilised dress, with the assumed exception of gloves. Why, then, give a fourteen years' monopoly for so obvious a consequence of things already done, as the transfer of the India-rubber to the gloves?

"The exception that might be taken to the glove patent is twofold, viz. first, that its object was frivolous—a change in the fashion of an inconsiderable article of dress; and, secondly, that its subject was frivolous—the invention, so to call it, of shifting an elastic band from one piece of dress to another.

"Let us now suppose, for the sake of argument, that even under the present law the glove patent was invalid, on the ground of a total absence of invention—who was to dispute it?

"It is," said Mr. Grove (1018), if I may venture to apply his general remarks to a particular case, 'the patentee's interest to give a very large sum to support his patent; his patent, although for a very trivial thing, may, taking the vast extent of sale, be a very lucrative affair; . . . the public is a scattered body, not one of whom has sufficient interest to meet with equal force the patentee; and that,' continued Mr. Grove, 'is one of the difficulties which I should like to see my way to remedying.'

"From the instance of the elastic glove wrist, we will turn for a moment to a more solid and bulky specimen of triviality.

"Nearly the whole of the patents for the boilers of steam-engines at this moment," said Mr. Scott Russell (768), 'are of no practical value to inventors or to the public, but they are continually getting every man who makes a boiler into a scrape with some patentee, because almost every conceivable form of boiler, and bit of boiler, having been previously patented, one cannot make any sort of boiler without infringing some man's patent.'

On the other hand, we have the opinion of Mr. Carpmael:—

"Would you," said Mr. Grove to Mr. Carpmael (273), 'grant a patent, without any restriction, for anything which the law now calls an invention or an improvement, provided it be fairly described on the face of the specification?'

"Undoubtedly," answered Mr. Carpmael. 'I believe that that is the least of the evils; that it is better to grant a patent upon the risk of the inventor as to whether his invention is new and useful, than to attempt to investigate his invention, which may never come to anything; and yet, if the investigation is made in every case, it would cost a great deal of money without a proportionate benefit to the public or to the inventors.'

"Then you see no inconvenience," said Lord Stanley (274), 'in a multitude of temporary monopolies being created, a very large proportion of which are for inventions of so trivial and worthless a character that it is not found worth while by the inventors themselves to continue their patent beyond the first three years?'

"Forty years' experience," continued Mr. Carpmael, 'has shewn me that there is no prejudice whatever in granting these patents. I have no hesitation in giving the most decided opinion as to there being no prejudice to the manufacturer or the public by these patents being granted.

"I consider it next to impossible," said Sir J. Romilly (p. 178), 'in most cases, to determine beforehand, and until the invention has been put into practical operation, whether an invention for which a patent is claimed is of a trifling or frivolous nature. I believe that the best and most experienced persons might frequently be mistaken, and form an erroneous judgment as to the value of an invention.'

"It is not advisable, in my opinion," said Lord Chelmsford (p. 179), 'to change the present system. An invention which is apparently trivial, but really useful, might be rejected; whilst a trifling invention of no utility will be neglected by the public, and the patentee will alone bear the consequences of his idle and frivolous experiment.'

The investigation must be deferred until the claimant is prepared to file a complete specification; for—

"A preliminary investigation would of necessity involve a judgment upon the form of the specification; for how could novelty be predicated of an undefined invention? One would think, that either the specification ought to be supervised by authority, as Mr. Hindmarch proposes; or else the patentee ought to be rigorously held to have claimed whatever is described in his specification, and is not expressly disclaimed."

"As far as I have seen," said Mr. Justice Montague Smith (1243), 'every man who makes any change whatever in a machine, which he thinks at all beneficial, takes out a patent for it, and embraces probably the whole machine, and leaves you to find out where his little improvement is."

After citing the adverse opinion of the present Attorney-General, and pointing out that the method of preliminary investigation has been tried and abandoned in France, Austria, Sardinia, and Belgium, and that, though in use in Prussia and America, it does not give satisfaction there, Mr. Wilson insists that in the present state of manufacture and invention, the question of novelty, which has always been allowed to be a ground of preliminary objection, is inseparable from that of relative merit, and that is of necessity a question of discretion:—

"But must the exercise of discretion precede the granting of the patent? Would it not be enough to allow the question of merit to be raised afterwards, as a ground of resistance to the patent, by a plea that the patented invention is not meritorious? I answer in the words of Mr. Grove (1034)—

"We have at present an admitted difficulty; the question is, what are the means of getting rid of it? I am far from saying," he added, with reference to his proposition, that the merit of the invention should be substantiated before the granting of the patent, "that the means do not in themselves present difficulties; the question is, whether the balance of difficulties is not more one way than the other?"

"These words of a commissioner justify me in saying, that the report proposes too much or too little; that we should have either no preliminary investigation, or a complete one; and as the general feeling seems to be, that the patent law, if it is to be preserved, must be changed, I accept the latter alternative. I propose, in short, that the granting or refusal of a patent should be determined in each case, with reference to all its circumstances, by an exercise of discretion. Is it said that meritorious inventions, perhaps a good many of them, will be rejected? I admit this consequence as inevitable; but if the specifications should be registered, with the grounds of rejection, the disappointed applicants might, in some small degree, be compensated by the nation, when the merit of their inventions should have become evident, by honorary distinctions and pecuniary rewards. Or, even if this were not so, we had better have the nerve to cut off a limb, than sit still while the patient is dying of lockjaw.

"The discretionary power of rejection might be exercised, as Mr. Scott Russell proposed (828), not only at starting, but also when stamp duties become payable at the end of the third and seventh years, perhaps also at some later stage:—

"That is to say," as Mr. Grove observed to Mr. Scott Russell, "you would make it incumbent upon a patentee, when he came to make his second payment after the three years, to make out a case before a court, and also at the end of seven years, and so on?" "Yes," answered the witness, "I hold that that is not a new principle, for you at present do it beyond the fourteen years."

"Discretion, then, at starting; discretion at the end of the third year, and at the end of the seventh year, and perhaps also at some period after the seventh year—discretion, eked out by a national compensation or acknowledgment, in honour and money, to unappreciated merit—this principle I submit to the society, as a possible remedy for the multifarious practical evils which at present so largely qualify the benefits of the patent law. Discretion, as the source of discretionary law; the principle from which has been developed the splendid system of equitable jurisprudence which regulates the decisions of the Court of Chancery."

As to the mode of conducting the inquiry:—

"The authority ought, in my opinion, to rest with the law officers; but for their assistance there ought to be a permanent board, combining legal, mechanical, and chemical talents, to exercise functions analogous to those of a chief clerk of a Vice-Chancellor. Perhaps one case in twenty, or a still smaller proportion of the business, would involve a personal exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the Attorney or Solicitor General; and the occasional duty might be remunerated by a moderate fee on every application for a patent.

"It would, I think, be indispensable to the working of the proposed discretionary jurisdiction that the unsuccessful applicant or opponent should have a right of appeal: and the best appellate jurisdiction would be the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The right of appeal might be troublesome at first, but only till the new practice should have been worked into shape. An appeal would not harm the respondent, for he might appear in person before the Judicial Committee at a small cost: the appellant would be kept in check by a necessity, to which he should be subject, of giving security for the costs of the appeal."

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE WORKING OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861, AND TO REPORT THEREON.

(Ordered to be printed the 21st March, 1865).

(Concluded from p. 133).

2. As to the introduction of a system of preliminary examination, its character, and by whom it should be conducted.

It is urged, in opposition to any further course of preliminary examination than that which is at present pursued, first, that the principle of our law requires the inventor himself to make such an examination, inasmuch as he takes out a patent at his own risk; and next, that it could not be conducted in a manner free from objection. That if it were ex parte, the interests of the public would be no better protected than they now are; if subject to opposition, the inventor would be deprived of the protection of secrecy, while he would, in fact, be subjected to a premature trial of his patent; and that such a trial, even if it resulted in his success, would be no protection to him against future litigation.

That if the result of such an examination was to be final, the examining body would seldom undertake the responsibility of refusing a patent; if subject to appeal, they would, on the hearing of that appeal, be placed in the position of defendants. That on the whole the result would be, increased expense and delay to the patentee, with no greater security either to him or to the public. These opinions, though proceeding from a limited number of witnesses, deserve consideration, from the knowledge and experience of those by whom they are entertained.

On the other hand, there is a very strong expression of opinion, and one not confined to any particular class of persons, in favour of some more strict preliminary examination. It is suggested by a few of these, but only by a few, that such an examination ought to embrace an inquiry, not only into the novelty, but into the utility of the invention. It is admitted that the inquiry as to novelty must be limited to matter which is to be found in a printed form, and should not extend to oral testimony as to priority of user.

It is proposed that such an examination be conducted by the members of a mixed board of examiners, consisting of one or more barristers, and a proportionate number of practical and scientific men; and that this board should, unless forming part of, or acting in concert with, some special tribunal to be appointed for the trial of patent cases, be assistant and subordinate to the law officers of the Crown, whose official duties in respect to patents should otherwise remain unaltered. That the result of this examination should be, either a decision, subject to one final appeal, or a certificate which, whether favourable or unfavourable, should be appended to the specification.

The general opinion seems to be, that the interest of the public would be sufficiently protected at the hands of the examiners, and that, at any rate, the result would be to exclude many applications which now, of necessity, pass without comment.

With respect to caveats, it is held by a majority of witnesses, that the present system should remain unaltered, subject to such modifications in practice as might be required by the institution of preliminary investigation.

3. As to the propriety of making licenses compulsory, or of requiring user within a given period.

As against these propositions, it is contended by some witnesses, that patentees are, as a rule, willing to grant licenses to work their inventions on reasonable terms. To do so is obviously their interest; and it may be assumed, that what is men's interest to do will generally be done. Exceptions may occur; but these, it is asserted, will be insufficient in number and importance to justify a peculiarly sweeping interference with rights to which the law has assigned the character of property.

Apart from the above considerations, the practical difficulties appear to be regarded as all but insuperable. No rule can be laid down for estimating the value of a patent, or the amount of charge which may be reasonably imposed on those using it. These will vary in every instance; and it is manifestly futile to require the inventor to grant a license when applied to, unless some provision be made for determining the price to be paid. In the absence of such provision, a prohibitory price would render the law inoperative. But on this question of price, individual opinions must be expected to vary widely; and it is impossible to suppose that any system of arbitration would prove satisfactory, where neither precedent, nor custom, nor fixed rule of any kind could be appealed to on either side.

4. As to the repeal of invalid patents.

It appears to be generally felt, more especially by those who are immediately concerned in managing the litigation of patent rights, that some proceeding, more simple in form, and therefore more expeditious, should be adopted for the repeal of invalid patents. That this might either be by petition to your Majesty in Council, or by motion in a court of equity. The most serious objection to the present mode of proceeding seems to be, that while a patentee, if he maintains his patent, will only get such costs as may be covered by the bond which is required from the petitioner against him; the petitioner, on the other hand, if he succeeds in his object of upsetting the patent, will get no costs.

As regards the issues to be tried, it has not been shewn to us that any alteration in the form of the proceeding for repeal would materially shorten them, or diminish the expenses of the trial.

III.

The evidence before us shews an almost universal feeling of dissatisfaction with the present mode of trying questions of patent right, while there are many and various proposals for the constitution of a tribunal which should be more expeditious, and less expensive. The principal fault of the system lies in this—that the jury by whom the case is tried, seldom possess even so much scientific knowledge as is necessary to enable them to understand the evidence. Advantage is constantly taken of this deficiency: first, in a subtle and vague drawing of specifications; again, by an artful generality in the form of framing the issues to be tried; lastly, on the trial, by the introduction of a cloud of scientific evidence, to perplex rather than to explain the true points at issue. It is possible that these difficulties might to some extent be obviated, as has been suggested to us, by requiring a greater strictness in drawing the specification and claim of the patentee, or by a more perfect scheme for settling, in the presence of a judge, the issues to be tried; but it is almost without exception admitted that a radical remedy is only to be found in reforming the constitution of the tribunal itself.

The main point in doubt is, whether this reform should go to the extent of constituting a special court for the trial of patent cases, or whether the existing jurisdictions of the courts of law and equity should be maintained in a modified form. The objections to a special court are various and strong. In the first place, the want of sufficient business to occupy its time fully. Secondly, that, on trials of patent cases, questions are frequently arising which require an extended knowledge of other branches of the law; and that a judge selected for his special acquaintance with mechanical and scientific topics, and one who in his judicial capacity was principally engaged in the consideration of such questions, would not be so competent to deal with the whole subject-matter of the case as one by whom all branches of our law were in turn handled. Thirdly, that such a constitution of the court would render it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to secure an effectual appeal. We do not find that these views (with the exception, perhaps, of the first) have been met by arguments of equal weight. Assuming, therefore, that it would not be advantageous to constitute a special patent court, we have to consider what has been proposed in aid of the existing jurisdictions.

The general proposal is, that the judge, on trial of a patent case, should either be aided by scientific assessors, or that the case should be tried by a jury composed of from five to seven scientific persons. The latter plan does not appear to us to be wholly satisfactory, owing to the difficulty there would always be in getting a sufficient number of scientific men to compose a jury, sufficiently competent and unbiassed.

The conclusion which we have drawn from the evidence is, that a court might be satisfactorily formed on the former plan, taking as a general model of its constitution your Majesty's High Court of Admiralty, assisted by the Trinity Brethren. It is difficult accurately to estimate the weight of evidence, as to whether those assessors should act judicially, or merely by way of instruction and advice to the judge; but the balance seems rather to incline to the latter view, which would place them in a very similar position with the assessors to the High Court of Admiralty. There is, again, a great variety of opinion as to the mode in which the assessors should be chosen. It is said, on the one hand, that they might be selected by the judge, or by the parties, with a reference, in case of dispute, to the judge, from scientific men generally. With respect to this latter proposal, the only doubt is, whether, considering the high value which is put upon scientific evidence, men of sufficient eminence would be induced, by any such fee as the court would pay, to give up either their usual avocations or the chance of being employed by one or other of the parties to the suit. On the other hand, if such assessors are to be a permanent and independent body, there will be a like difficulty in providing for payment of sufficient salaries to secure the services of scientific men numerous enough to give the opportunity of selection for the various classes of cases, and eminent enough in their professions to be willingly accepted by the parties.

It seems to be generally thought that the assistance of an ordinary jury in patent cases is not requisite; there is, however, a certain amount of unwillingness to give up that which is considered by many the safest form of tribunal for the weighing of facts and probabilities; it has, therefore, been suggested, that the employment of a jury might be at the joint request of the parties, or at the discretion of the judge.

We have been informed that no difficulty would be found in setting apart a court for the trial of patent cases, and in providing for the attendance in rotation of one of the judges of the courts of law and equity.

IV.

1. As to granting letters-patent to importers of foreign inventions, and to foreigners.

It has long been the practice, founded on judicial decision, to consider that the use or publication of an invention abroad did not deprive that invention of the character of "a new manufacture within this realm." It appears to us, and is generally admitted in the evidence, that the present facilities of communication subsisting between all parts of the world have done away with the only valid reason for such a construction of the words of the Statute of Monopolies. The object of allowing such patents might fairly be, in an age of slow international communication, to encourage enterprising persons to go in search of, and to introduce to this country, useful processes employed abroad, but not otherwise likely to be adopted here, for the want of which we should long have been behind other nations. It does not, however, seem worth while to continue the same facilities now, when foreign inventions are most frequently patented in this country and in their native land simultaneously; especially, as we are well informed, that one result of the practice is to encourage unscrupulous persons to steal the inventions of foreigners, and to run a race with the legitimate owner to get them patented here.

The general opinion seems to be in favour of granting patents to foreigners, or to their agents or nominees in this country. By some persons it is proposed to limit the grant to natives of those countries whose Governments allow the reciprocal privilege to your Majesty's subjects. And, further, to impose as a condition, that the invention be worked, or licenses granted for working it, in this country, following the system which prevails generally on the continent.

2. As to confirmations.

With a single exception, and that merely as a statement of opinion, unsupported by argument, we find no suggestions made to us with a view to the alteration of the present system on this point. We find that only seven applications have been made for confirmation of a patent under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 83, s. 2, and only one of such applications has been acceded to. We see no reason for retaining a power of which no practical use is made.

3. As to prolongations.

We do not find that the witnesses, with one exception, complain of the existence of prolongations; this may, however, be accounted for by their extreme rarity.

A careful consideration of the evidence given by the clerk to your Majesty's Privy Council, leads us to the opinion, that prolongations should not be in future granted.

The power of granting them is in its nature arbitrary; and it does not seem just that the public should be excluded for a term of years from the use of an invention, which in the ordinary course of law would otherwise become public, simply because the inventor has reaped from it a smaller profit (possibly through his own want of business habits) than he thought himself entitled to expect. The uncertainty, moreover, whether an application for prolongation will or will not be granted, is an evil to all parties concerned.

4. As to disclaimers and memoranda of alterations.

It has been stated to us that the former of these proceedings sometimes results in the enlargement of the patentee's rights, and that more strictness ought, therefore, to be exercised in allowing them.

With respect to memoranda of alterations, we do not find that any serious objection is taken to a continuance of the present system. It is, indeed, suggested that, following the French law, patents of addition should be allowed. No reasons, however, are given in support of this view.

We have thus stated to your Majesty the general result of the evidence before us, and the conclusions to which we have come after considering it.

We now humbly submit to your Majesty the following recommendations, which are founded on these conclusions:—

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. Your commissioners do not find that the present cost of obtaining letters-patent is excessive, or the method of payment inconvenient; they do not therefore recommend any alteration of the present system on those points; but they think that patent fees should not be made to contribute to the general expenditure of the State until every reasonable requirement of the Patent Office has been satisfied.

2. They are unable to recommend a preliminary investigation into the merits of the invention for which a patent is claimed; but they advise that a careful inquiry be instituted under the direction of the law officers of the Crown, as to whether there has been any previous documentary publication of the invention, either by grant of letters-patent, or otherwise; and if such publication have taken place, that he patent shall be refused.

No evidence other than such documentary evidence should be admissible, and the reasons for the refusal to grant the patent should be certified by the law officers; an appeal from their decision should lie to the Lord Chancellor.

3. Your commissioners are of opinion that the present mode of trying the validity of patents, is not conducted in a satisfactory manner. That such trials ought to take place before a judge sitting with the aid of scientific assessors, but without a jury, unless at the desire of both parties to the suit or action. That such assessors ought to be selected by the judge in each case, and the remuneration to be paid them be included in the costs of the suit or action, and provided for in such manner as the judge shall direct.

That no special judge be appointed for the trial of patent cases, but that the judges of law and equity be empowered to make rules by which one court should sit for trial of patent cases exclusively. That on such trial the judge, if sitting without a jury, decide questions of fact as well as of law.

4. That the granting of licenses to use patented inventions ought not to be made compulsory.

5. That patents ought not to be granted to importers of foreign inventions.

6. That in no case ought the term for which a patent is granted to be extended beyond the original period of fourteen years.

7. That in all patents hereafter to be granted, a proviso shall be inserted, to the effect, that the Crown shall have the power to use any invention therein patented without previous license or consent of the patentee, subject to payment of a sum to be fixed by the Treasury.

8. While, in the judgment of the commissioners, the changes above suggested will do something to mitigate the inconveniences now generally complained of by the public, as incident to the working of the patent law, it is their opinion that these inconveniences cannot be wholly removed. They are, in their belief, inherent in the nature of a patent law, and must be considered as the price which the public consents to pay for the existence of such a law.

REPORT OF MR. HINDMARCH.

May it please your Majesty,

As one of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the working of the law relating to letters-patent for inventions, I humbly crave leave to report to your Majesty what I deem to be the results of the inquiry into that subject directed by your Majesty.

I concur in some, but not in all, of the recommendations contained in the report made to your Majesty by the other commissioners, and it appears to me that the law relating to patents requires amendment in several other particulars not mentioned in that report.

I concur in the first recommendation in the report with respect to the cost of obtaining letters-patent; but I think that the mode of granting patents for inventions requires amendment.

It appears to me that the law is at present defective in making no provision for an appeal against the decision of a law officer adverse to an applicant for letters-patent, and I beg leave to recommend that when the decision of a law officer is adverse to a petitioner, he should have the same right of appeal as a person who fails in an opposition, so that the parties may be placed upon an equal footing.

Specifications of inventions are frequently prepared in such a manner as to occasion great difficulty in construing them, and in ascertaining the nature and extent of the claims of invention which they are intended to make. And from this cause the cost of litigating patent rights is often greatly enhanced.

There is too much reason for believing that specifications are frequently thus prepared with a fraudulent object. A specification ought to define the invention intended to be comprised in a patent, so as to enable any person of ordinary skill and intelligence, upon reading it, to ascertain without difficulty the nature and extent of the right conferred by the patent. If an alleged invention cannot be so described, it is one which (if it deserves to be called an invention) ought not to be made the subject of a patent.

I recommend that no patent should be granted for an invention until a specification of it, containing a clear and distinct statement of the claim or claims made by the inventor, has been filed in the Patent Office, and that the sufficiency of all claims in specifications should be ascertained and certified by competent persons appointed to perform that duty.

It appears to me that any official inquiry into the novelty of an invention sought to be made the subject of a patent must necessarily be incomplete and unsatisfactory. To institute such an inquiry, even in an imperfect manner, would occasion a considerable amount of expense to the public, and I think it better to adhere to the present practice, under which the responsibility of inquiring into the novelty of an invention sought to be patented is thrown upon the applicant who alleges his invention to be new.

According to the present law, an application for a patent is refused if a party opposing the grant makes it clear that the invention was not new at the date of the application, or that the applicant was not then the first and true inventor; but in doubtful cases the practice is to grant the patents, there being at present no means of trying the rights of the parties in a satisfactory manner. I submit that it would be an improvement if, when there is a disputed state of facts with respect to the right of a petitioner to an invention which he claims, the Lord Chancellor were to be authorised to direct the question in issue to be tried between the parties before the grant of any patent for the invention.

The form of a patent might be advantageously shortened; and in order to effect that object, many of the provisions usually contained in patents for inventions might be made applicable to them by express enactment; and I recommend that every patent should be printed and issued, together with a printed copy of the specification of the invention to which it relates.

I concur in the statement in the third recommendation contained in the report of the other commissioners, that the present mode of trying questions of fact respecting the validity of patents is not satisfactory; and I think that the same observation is applicable to the manner in which questions respecting infringements of patents are tried.

The evidence given before the commissioners induces me to recommend that such questions should be tried by a judge or judges, aided (when deemed necessary) by scientific assessors, but without a jury, unless required by both parties to the suit.

And I concur with the other commissioners, that it is desirable that all the judges of the existing courts of law and equity should be made judges of one and the same court, which I think should be a court both of law and of equity, for the determination of all matters in dispute relating to patents, with all the powers of the existing courts respecting such matters, and I recommend that the jurisdiction of the court should extend to the whole of the kingdom.

But without some addition to the number of judges it will be found impracticable to obtain the speedy satisfactory determination of disputes respecting patent rights now desired by the public.

The surplus revenue derived from patents is much more than sufficient to pay the expense consequent upon the institution of such a court as above mentioned, with any additional judge or judges which the business of the court may require; and if any additional judge of that court shall be appointed, the objection to having a judge who confines his attention to a limited class of subjects might be obviated by calling upon him to perform other duties similar to those performed by the other common law and equity judges.

Patent rights are of limited duration, and suits respecting them in the ordinary tribunals of the country have frequently continued until the expiration of the terms for which they were granted. To prevent this evil, I beg leave to recommend, that in patent suits there should be an appeal from the decisions of the judges trying the causes to some of the other judges of the court, and from their decisions to the House of Lords, but no other appeal.

I concur in the fourth recommendation of the report of the other commissioners respecting the granting of licenses, and also in the fifth recommendation, that patents ought not to be granted to the importers of foreign inventions.

But I am unable to concur in the sixth recommendation in the report, that in no case ought the term for which a patent has been granted to be extended beyond the original period of fourteen years.

It is well known to be the policy of the law to encourage the invention of novelties and improvements in the production of useful manufactures by grants of temporary exclusive privileges to the inventors, by whom the knowledge of them shall be first given to the public. The term of fourteen years by the Statute of Monopolies prescribed for the duration of the grants of such privileges appears to be amply sufficient in the greater number of cases in which inventors are to be rewarded by grants of patent rights. But it cannot with fairness be alleged that the grant of such a term must, therefore, in every case, be deemed to be a sufficient reward to an inventor, however valuable his invention may be to the public, whatever may have been the labour and the ingenuity of the inventor in producing and perfecting the invention for the benefit of the public; and although he may not only have made no profit, but sustained great loss, by his endeavours to bring his invention into public use. It appears to me that it is highly expedient that prolongations should continue to be granted in every case in which the public shall be shewn to have derived great advantage from a patentee's invention, and in which the inventor shall have failed, without any fault of his own, during his original term to obtain a sufficient reward for his ingenuity, labour, and pecuniary expenditure. And it appears to be the more expedient to grant extensions of patents in such cases, in order to encourage inventors to apply the peculiar skill and knowledge which they possess to effect the greatest attainable improvement in the practice of their inventions for the benefit of the public.

According to the present practice, however, the interests of the public are not sufficiently protected upon the hearing of applications for prolongations, more especially in unopposed cases, and I recommend a careful inquiry, by competent persons, to be instituted in every case into the claims of the petitioner for the extension sought to be obtained, the result of that inquiry to be reported to the Privy Council at the hearing of the application.

I concur with the other commissioners in opinion, that the Crown should have the power of using any patented invention which may be deemed useful in the service of the country, and that when any such invention shall have been so used, the patentee should be rewarded out of the public treasury, according to the benefit which his invention shall have conferred upon the public service.

It is difficult to say what would be the best mode of determining the amount of the reward to be given to a patentee in such a case; but I recommend that in every case in which the amount cannot be fixed by agreement between the officers of the Crown and the patentee, it should be determined by the tribunal (not being a jury) which by law may be authorised to determine the amount of a patentee's claim for damages in an action for the infringement of a patent.

The law officers of the Crown, according to the present state of the law, have the sole power of disposing of applications for leave to enter disclaimers and memorandums of alteration relating to titles of patented inventions and specifications.

That mode of disposing of such applications is sufficient in many cases, but cases occasionally occur in which important facts come into dispute, which the law officers have not the means of satisfactorily determining; I therefore recommend, that in every such case there should be a right of appeal given to an applicant, or a party opposing the appeal; such appeal to be heard by the Lord Chancellor, or a judge to whom he shall think fit to refer it.

The present mode of revoking and cancelling patents for inventions is by an action of scire facias, in which a person complaining of the illegality of a patent is authorised, by the fiat of the Attorney-General, to proceed in the name of the Crown to obtain the judgment of the Court of Chancery for the revocation and cancelling of the patent. This use of the name of the Crown appears to be highly objectionable, and the whole proceeding is cumbrous, dilatory, and expensive. I recommend, that in lieu of the proceeding by scire facias, any person complaining of the illegality of a patent, should be enabled to apply by petition in a summary way to the Lord Chancellor to have the patent revoked and cancelled, and that upon every such petition, the Lord Chancellor, or any court or judge appointed by him to hear the matters of the petition, should have the same powers as the Court of Chancery has in an action of scire facias.

If a court such as above suggested shall be instituted, the hearing of such petitions might conveniently take place in that court.

Applications for patents, and for leave to enter disclaimers and memorandums of alteration, as well as oppositions to such applications, are generally conducted by persons called patent agents. Some patent agents are persons of skill and probity; but as every person who can obtain employment is at liberty to act as a patent agent, the consequence has been, that grossly incompetent and fraudulent persons have acted as patent agents, to the great loss and injury of unwary inventors induced to employ them.

Patent agents are not at present subject to the control of any court or other authority, and there are, therefore, no adequate means of punishing them for malversation or gross incompetence.

The right of persons to act as patent agents, without being admitted solicitors or officers of the Court of Chancery, has been too long established to be taken away, at all events, so far as respects persons at present in practice.

I beg leave to recommend that the names of all the present patent agents should be registered in the office of the Commissioners of Patents, and that no person should heretofore be permitted to practise as a patent agent until examined by some competent authority, in order to ascertain his competency; that all persons, so registered as patent agents, should annually obtain certificates of their right to practise, and should be made liable to be punished for misconduct by the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls.

There are now several acts of Parliament in existence relating wholly or in part to patents for inventions. In any alteration of the patent law which may be made by Parliament, I beg leave to recommend that all the existing enactments relating to the subject, passed since the Statute of Monopolies, should be repealed, and the whole of the law (with the exception of that statute) consolidated in one act.

All which I submit to your Majesty with great humility, and with great deference to the opinions of the other commissioners expressed in their report, which are not in accord with those I thus humbly submit to your Majesty.

W. M. HINDMARCH.

REPORT OF MR. FAIRBAIRN.

May it please your Majesty,

I have signed the report, as settled by a majority of the commissioners, with the exception of the sixth recommendation (in which I was unable to concur), "that in no case ought the time for which a patent has been granted to be extended beyond fourteen years." On this question I agree with the views expressed by Mr. Hindmarch in his report, that in cases where the public have derived advantages from a patentee's invention, and where the patentee has not been remunerated, it is then desirable, and highly expedient, that prolongations should be granted. In these views I heartily concur, and also in several useful suggestions contained in that report.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 22, 1865.

THE 34th section of the stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, for the limitation of actions and suits relating to real property, enlarged the effect of adverse possession, by making it operate to extinguish the title as well as the remedy of the once rightful owner. "At the determination of the period limited by this act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent, or advowson, for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or suit respectively might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished." It follows that after the lapse of the statutory period, the late owner regaining possession by any means is not remitted to his former title. (Brasington v. Llewellyn, 27 L. J., Ex., 297). In Hanks v. Palling (6 El. & Bl. 668), however, where a purchaser of a fee-farm rent was held bound by a stipulation that he should make no objection on the ground of the non-payment of the rent during the last twenty years, Coleridge, J., asked, during the argument, "Is the rent itself extinguished? Does sect. 34 do more than extinguish the right to sue for it? If, after non-payment for twenty years, a series of fresh payments were made, might not the old rent be said to exist without a fresh grant?" and the Court, in giving judgment, carefully avoided expressing an opinion on the effect of the statute. There seems to have been no need of such caution; for the previous clauses having barred the remedy, the 34th section has obviously no other object than to extinguish the right; and the language is unambiguous. Accordingly, in The Incorporated Society v. Richards 1 Drn. & W. 289, Lord St. Leonards said, "Under the new act, when the remedy is barred, the right and title of the real owner are extinguished." But he proceeded to add, "and are in effect transferred to the person whose possession is a bar." In saying that, however, we conceive that he went beyond the letter, and possibly beyond the meaning of the act, which has not made any provision for vesting the title of which it deprives the dispossessed late owner. A learned commentator thus states and illustrates the operation of the statute upon the title:—"The distinction between the right of possession and the right of property is now reduced to this—that though the right of possession may be in one person as against strangers, and the right of property be in another, yet the right of property can exist no longer as a mere right, but only in connexion with a right of entry at least. The present state of the law may be illustrated, by supposing that land is settled upon A. for life, remainder to B. in fee; that C. dispossesses A., and continues in possession for twenty years. Now, if A. be still living, his right is extinct, and the right of possession is absolute in C., for the life of A.; but if A. be dead within twenty years, then the right of C. is defeasible, being merely an apparent or presumptive right of possession, or that right which the law admits and protects till a better right is proved, while the true right of possession, or that right which flows from the right of property itself, is in B. If, in the state of circumstances last supposed, C. be dispossessed by D., a stranger, then C., having a right of possession as against all mankind except B., may recover the possession in ejectment from D. (3 Man. & R. 112, note); for to permit D., who has no colour of title to retain the possession against C., who has a prima facie title (see Doe v. Penfold, 8 Car. & P. 436, and Doe v. Birchmore, 1 Per. & D. 448), would be not merely to disquiet the possession without advancing the ends of justice, but possibly to do injustice, since the wrong of C. may have ripened into a right, while the wrong of D. is still recent and notorious. In the meantime the title is really in B., who brings ejectment against C., and recovers by force of a right superior to that which enabled C. to recover from D.—by force of the right of property itself. But if B. should neglect to bring his ejectment within twenty years from the death of A., then the statute would at once bar his right of entry, and extinguish his right of property, and thus, by a necessary consequence, confer upon C. an absolute right to the possession as against every possible claimant under the supposed settlement, for the bar to the now sole remedy would close the door against all but vexatious litigation; and the utter extinction of the right would deprive the late owner of every chance of the resurrection of his title by any other means." (1 Hayes Conv. 268).

We conceive that the distinguished writer, from whom we have taken the above observations, is in error when he says, that if C. is dispossessed by D. while the right of entry is really in B., C. may recover the possession in ejectment from D. This would be contrary to "the well-established rule, that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover by the strength of his own title, without any regard to the weakness of the defendants." (2 Wms. Saund. 111 (a)). Of course, C. might recover upon proving his prior possession, as upon a prima facie title, if D. was unable to shew that the real title was elsewhere. (Allen v. Rivington, 2 Wms. Saund. 111; Doe v. Dyeball, Moo. & M. 346). The authorities cited by Mr. Hayes go no further. But though prior possession for any period, however short, may, if unexplained, be sufficient to establish a presumption of title, the defendant may rebut the presumption by shewing that the title is in another, as in Doe d. Crisp v. Baker (2 T. R. 749), where the lessor of the plaintiff entered into possession of a rectory house at Lady-day, 1787, under a lease by the rector, and remained in possession until the 17th March, 1788, when he was dispossessed by the defendant, who had no colour of title. On the trial, the defendant relied on the 13 Eliz. c. 20, which enacts, that "no lease of any benefice, &c. shall endure any longer than while the lessor shall be ordinarily resident, without absence above fourteen days in one year; but that every such lease, immediately upon such absence, shall cease and be void." The rector was wholly resident in another place. The Court, expressing their regret that such a possession as that of the defendant should find a shield from an act of Parliament, the policy of which might then be much doubted, held, that though the defendant was a stranger and a wrongdoer, the plaintiff could not recover.

It is further to be observed, that the statement, that after twenty years' dispossession of A., the tenant for life, C., the dispossession, is, during the remainder of A.'s life, absolutely entitled to the possession of the land, though it may be a legitimate deduction from the enactment that A.'s right and title shall be extinguished, has no counterpart in the language of the act. We think that C.'s title is not perfectly clear. The 34th section extinguishes the right and title of A., and does not profess to transfer it to the occupier. Indeed, Mr. Hayes proceeds to say—"We must not, however, confound the negative effect of the statute with the positive effect of a conveyance. In the example last considered, the rights of A. and B. do not become the rights of C., under a species of involuntary alienation effected by the statute. If that hypothesis were adopted, it would follow, that when the bar became complete as against the tenant for life, C. acquired a lawful estate per autre vie; in short, that when the land is in settlement, the adverse possessor would be from time to time invested with interests measured by those of the successive takers, whether chattel or freehold, and consequently be owner to-day of a short term of years, to-morrow of the fee. Such is not the operation of the statute. The wrongdoer must be considered, according to the principle of the OLD law, as claiming generally, and, therefore, as claiming the absolute property (unless, indeed, he expressly qualify his claim), and the statute as merely diminishing from time to time the danger of eviction, till at length his originally precarious fee becomes, by the exclusion of every stronger claim, a firm inheritance." This is, unquestionably, as far as it goes, a more correct statement of the effect of the act than that contained in the judgment of Parke, B., in Doe d. Jukes v. Sumner (14 M. & W. 42), that it "makes a parliamentary conveyance of the land to the person in possession after the period of twenty years has elapsed." The right and title of the tenant for life are extinguished, and not transferred. If they were transferred, they would be transferred with the charges on them. So that if A. were lessee for life at a rent (and if Grant v. Ellis (9 M. & W. 113) be right^a), C. would not, under the notion of a parliamentary conveyance, be liable in debt for the rent as assignee. The estate of A. has determined: has not that determination of the particular estate accelerated the remainder? The remainder is all that is left of the fee, after deducting the particular estate; and a remainder must always have a particular estate to support it, although it is sufficient if the estate be a right of entry, without actual entry. (Archer's case, 1 Rep. 67 a.) The remainderman, then, being entitled, subject to the life estate, must have the right of entry when that life estate, which was the only impediment to his possession, has ceased, by whatever means; and a lessor who has parted with the right to the possession of his land to a tenant for life, cannot be kept from re-entry after that right has ceased by a mere wrongdoer.

A further question may arise, where the legal estate is held upon an implied trust for A. for life, and then for B. in fee, and A.'s title is barred by an adverse possession, insufficient to bar the trustee, whether the trustee or the occupier or B. is entitled to the beneficial enjoyment during A.'s life. See Dainty v. Brocklehurst (3 Exch. 207), which illustrates the difficulty of the defendant's position in such a case in respect of evidence, but is not, as we read it, inconsistent with the authorities we have cited.

The question under consideration was discussed in the case of Doe d. Carter v. Barnard (13 Q. B. 945), where the lessor of the plaintiff proved that in 1815 Robert Carter purchased the premises, and was let into possession, but did not obtain his conveyance until 1824; that Robert Carter immediately after his purchase allowed his son John to occupy the premises rent free as tenant at will, which occupation continued until John's death in 1834 (leaving children), from which time his widow, the lessee of the plaintiff, occupied the premises until she was dispossessed in 1848, by the defendant claiming, under a mortgage made by Robert Carter in 1829. A verdict having been directed and found for the plaintiff, it was contended, that as Robert Carter's title was barred by adverse possession during thirty-one years, and as John Carter's possession had not continued for twenty years, so as to create a rightful fee in him transmissible to his son and heir, there was no one who had a succession title to the lessor of the plaintiff, whose priority of possession must prevail against the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Patteson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "If she had been defendant in an action of ejectment, no doubt the non-possession of the lessor of the plaintiff, evidenced by her husband's and her own consecutive possession for more than twenty years, would have entitled her to the verdict on the words of the 2nd section of the act without the aid of the 34th section. (Doe d. Goody v. Carter, 9 Q. B. 863). Therefore it is said that the 34th section must have some further meaning, and must transfer the right. Probably that would be so if the same person or several persons claiming one from the other by descent, will, or conveyance, had been in possession for the twenty years. But this lessor of the plaintiff shewed nothing to connect her possession with that of her husband by right of any sort; and if she be right in her construction of the 34th section, the same consequence would follow if twenty persons unconnected with each other had been in possession each for one year consecutively for twenty years, yet it would be impossible to say to which of the twenty persons the 34th section has transferred the title. Without the aid of this statute, twenty years' possession gave a prima facie title against every one, and a complete title against a wrongdoer who could not shew any right, even if such wrongdoer had been in possession many years, provided they were less than twenty (Doe d. Hardinge v. Cooke, 7 Bing. 346); and the effect of the 34th section would probably be to give the right to the possession for twenty years, even against the party in whom the legal estate formerly was, and, but for the act, would still be when he had not obtained the possession till after the twenty years; but then we apprehend, as before stated, that such twenty years' possession must be either by the same person or several persons claiming one from the other, which is not the case here.

"The lessor of the plaintiff must, therefore, rely on her own possession for thirteen years as sufficient against the defendant, who has turned her out, and shews no title himself." After observing, that such proof of possession would have shewn a prima facie title, if nothing else had been shewn, the Court added, that here "the lessor of the plaintiff did more, for she proved the possession of her husband before her for eighteen years, which was prima facie evidence of his seisin in fee; and that he died in possession, and left children, which was prima facie evidence of the title of his heir, against which the lessor of the plaintiff's possession for thirty years could not prevail; and therefore she has, by her own shewing, proved the title to be in another, of which the defendant is entitled to take advantage."

The case of Doe v. Barnard involves four propositions:—First, that the possession of land, for however short a period, is prima facie evidence of title in the possessor, available against a wrongdoer within a period of twenty years from the determination of the possession. Second, that the prima facie title shewn by possession may be rebutted by proof of a real or antecedent prima facie title in another. Third, that a prima facie defeasible title resting on possession may ripen into an indefeasible title by lapse of time, sufficient to bar any preferable, actual, or prima facie title. Fourth, that the prima facie title shewn by possession is a title to the fee, for otherwise Mary Carter must have succeeded.

Thus, if A., the rightful owner of the fee, is out of possession, and B. is in possession without title, B. is prima facie entitled to the fee, and cannot be turned out, except by A., or one having title under A. If B., having been wrongfully in possession as owner, say for two months, is dispossessed by C., a wrongdoer, who remains in possession for nineteen years and ten months, A.'s title will be barred at the end of that period; and then, if C. continues in possession, he may be ejected by B., his heirs or assigns; but in the meantime C.'s possession cannot be disturbed by B., but only by A. These deductions from the case of Doe v. Barnard seem to us to be consistent with general principles; and we think that the following remarks on the case by the learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases (in the note to Napier v. Doe, vol. 2, p. 582), are founded on a misapprehension of the effect of the demise, suggested, probably, by some expressions in the earlier part of the judgment, which were not material to the point actually decided, and were corrected in the concluding sentence which we have quoted. The editors say, that in Doe v. Barnard, "Although the title of the original owner was extinguished, there was, according to the decision, no parliamentary conveyance of the land to any other person. This, it need scarcely be remarked, is a highly anomalous and exceptional result, and one which many will suggest a doubt as to the correctness of the decision which leads to it. The notion of land without an owner is inconsistent with the theory of real property in this country, and unless the Crown be entitled, which could not have been intended, the occupier at the time the original title expires seems to be the person in whom the right of property vests." We think we have shewn that no such anomaly as the existence of land without an owner is involved in the construction of the statute adopted in Doe v. Barnard, and that there is no necessity and no reason for adopting the conclusion that the statute, when it bars the title of the rightful owner in fee, transfers the fee to the person who happens to be in possession when the rightful title is extinguished. Such a state of the law might lead to most unseemly scrambles, and could be in no respect preferable to or more reasonable than that which we have deduced from Doe v. Barnard.

We may refer, in conclusion, to the case of Hawkesbee v. Hawksbee (11 Hare, 230), where a person who came into possession of a house as yearly tenant, having continued his possession for fifteen years without finding a person to whom to pay rent, devised the house to trustees, with power of sale, for the benefit of his widow and children. His eldest son occupied the house for fifteen years, paying rent to the widow, and after her death claimed to hold in his own right; but the Court, without deciding the question upon the statute, held, that the defendant, having got possession under the will, by paying rent to the widow, could not afterwards repudiate the testator's title.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, APRIL 29, 1865.

WE observe that the Courts have again had before them the curious learning depending on the alleged rule of our law, that there is no warranty of title in a sale of personal chattels. Perhaps, no portion of our law has year after year more startled and puzzled each succeeding set of students, or been more calculated to give them the impression, that law and reason may be two very different things, notwithstanding the law's proud assertion, that it is the perfection of common sense, i. e. the common law; for as to the poor statute law we are not aware that any such assumption is to be laid to its charge, and the perpetual snubbing it is always getting both from Bar and Bench, is not likely to encourage it in hoping for so great a distinction. Certainly, no portion of our law affords a better illustration of the effects of a perpetual struggle of our more recent judges to get out of the effects of an ill-advised doctrine laid down by their predecessors, without undertaking the responsibility of overruling it. The arch offender seems to be Noy, who boldly laid down in his Maxims, "If I take the horse of another man and sell him, and the owner takes him again, I may have an action of debt for the money; for the bargain was perfect by the delivery of the horse and caveat emptor." But strong as his proposition is, judges were found to recognise this doctrine, at all events to the extent of the case, where the seller did not know that he was selling another's property. Thus, in Waller's case (3 Rep. 22a.), one of the judges says, "If a man sells goods for money to be paid at several days, in such case, although the goods be taken by one who hath the right before the day, yet the seller shall have an action of debt in respect of the contract." In Early v. Garrett (9 B. & Cr. 928), Littledale, J., says, "It has been held, that where a man sells a horse as his own, when in truth it is the horse of another, the purchaser cannot maintain an action against the seller, unless he can shew that the seller knew it to be the horse of the other at the time of the sale." And in Ormerod v. Huth (14 M. & W. 664), Tindal, C. J., said, as to the cases on false representation of title, "in each of those cases there was either an assertion of title embodied in the contract, or a representation of title, which was false to the knowledge of the seller." And even in discussing cases, where they acknowledged that the result should be the other way, the rule was acknowledged by different judges, though its consequences were evaded by holding, that the representation need not be in words, but might be implied from the surrounding circumstances attending the sale; and also in cases where it was held, that, from the peculiar circumstances of the sale (for instance, a sale by a sheriff or pawnbroker), there was no warranty, it was not held, that peculiar circumstances were necessary in order to prevent there being a warranty. So that in Hall v. Conder (2 C. B., N. S., 22) the Court, in delivering judgment, said, "Upon the whole, we may safely conclude, that with regard to the sale of ascertained chattels, there is not any implied warranty, either of title or quality, unless there are some circumstances beyond the mere fact of a sale, from which it may be implied." Whilst the most said against it was said by Lord Campbell in Sims v. Marryatt (17 Q. B. 281), in remarking on the judgment of Parke, B., in Morley v. Attenborough (3 Exch. 500), "It may be that the learned baron is correct in saying, that on a sale of personal property, the maxim of caveat emptor does by the law of England apply; but if so, there are many exceptions stated in the judgment, which well nigh eat up the rule."

At last, in the late case of Eschols v. Bannister (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 15), the point was raised distinctly, whether a mere ordinary sale in a shop carried a warranty with it. The Court decided that it did; but though they express themselves in terms most unfavourable to the alleged general doctrine, they do not take upon themselves to say distinctly that it is not law. Erle, C. J., said, "I decide in accordance with the current of authorities, that if the vendor of a chattel at the time of sale, either by words affirm that he is such owner, or by his conduct give the purchaser to understand that he is such owner, then it forms part of the contract; and if it turn out that, in fact, he is not owner, the consideration fails, and the money so paid by the purchaser can be recovered back;" and, citing a dictum of Lord Wensleydale, that a sale in a shop carries a warranty, decides it to be law. He then proceeds to consider the contention of the counsel of the defendant, that there is no warranty in the sale of a personal chattel; and after citing the passage in Noy's Maxims, says, "This at first sight would shock the understanding of ordinary persons; but I take the meaning of the principle which it inculcates to be, that where the transaction is of this nature, that I have the manual possession of a chattel, and, without my affirming that I am owner or not, you choose to buy it of me as it is, and to give me the money for it, you, the purchaser, taking it on those terms, cannot afterwards recover back from me the price you have paid, because it turned out that I was not owner." He passes in review the cases as to sales by a pawnbroker and sheriff, and the sale of a patent right, and continues—"In all these cases I think the conduct of the vendor expressed that the sale was a sale of such title only as the vendor had; but in all ordinary sales, the party who undertakes to sell exercises thereby the strongest act of dominion over the chattel which he proposes to sell, and would, therefore, as I think, commonly lead a purchaser to believe that he was owner of the chattel. In almost all ordinary transactions in modern times the vendor, in consideration of the purchaser paying the price, is understood to affirm that he is owner of the article sold." And after saying that it is so put both by Blackstone, J., and Lord Wensleydale, that the passage from Noy is only a dictum, and that it has always been cited only as such, winds up with the before-quoted observation of Lord Campbell. Byles, J., says, "It has been stated over and over again, that the mere sale of chattels does not involve a warranty of title; but certainly such statement stands on barren ground, and is not supported by one single decision, and it is subject to this exception, that if the vendor, by his acts or by surrounding circumstances, affirm the goods to be his, then he does warrant the title;" and, after citing Kent's Commentaries, and a dictum of Buller, J., concludes, in these words:—"Lord Campbell was right when he said, that the exceptions to the application of caveat emptor had well nigh cut up the rule." And Keating, J., says, "Whether the present case be an exception to the general rule, or form part of it, we do not controvert any decision, or even dictum, when we say, that, under the circumstances of the present case, there was a warranty of title," because the goods were sold in a shop; and, as to such distinction, says, it "may certainly be fine, and there may be a sale out of a shop by a person exercising a right of ownership over the article sold, in the same way as by a sale in a shop; but it is not necessary to decide that point."

We do sincerely hope, that, on the first opportunity that offers, one of our Courts, in a considered judgment, will definitely put an end to this state of things; in terms declare, that there is no rule of law that a sale of goods carries no warranty of title; and that, by the common law as well as by common sense, a sale of goods is an assertion of ownership and warranty thereof, unless there be something in the nature of the transaction to shew that the parties did not contract on that footing; as in the case, for instance, of a sale by a sheriff or a pawnbroker, who professedly do not sell goods which belong to them.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Statements appeared in the Law Times and the Solicitors' Journal of Saturday last, to the effect that the judges had, at a meeting held at Serjeants'-inn on Wednesday, the 19th inst., expressed themselves as disapproving of, and opposed to, the scheme of the Bar Committee, appointed to prepare a plan for the amendment of the present system of Law Reporting.

Personal communication has been had with some of the judges and serjeants present on the occasion, to ascertain whether the representations made by the papers I have referred to were correct, and, upon the authority of Lord Chief Justice Erle, who presided on the occasion, I am enabled to state on behalf of the Council of Law Reporting, that no judge expressed or intimated, either directly or indirectly, any disapproval of the scheme. On the same authority I am also enabled to state, that the Society of Serjeants'-inn declined to send a representative to the Council, on the sole ground, that as it was known that the influence of the judges predominated in that society, such an act might be regarded as intended to influence the profession, whereas the judges considered it to be their duty to abstain from all present interference.

As this is a matter in which the profession should not be misled by any inaccurate statement, whether made by inadvertence or design, you will, perhaps, be willing to allow this explanation to appear in the columns of THE JURIST. I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JAMES T. HOPWOOD, Sec. pro tem.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS

APPOINTED TO PREPARE THE CODES OF THE LAWS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

To the Legislature of the State of New York.

THE commissioners of the code, appointed by the act of April 6, 1857*, having completed their labours, beg leave to make this their ninth and final report.

They have already reported, from time to time, the various steps taken by them in the progress of their work. Their duty, it will be remembered, as expressed in the act by which they were appointed, was "to reduce into a written and systematic code the whole body of the law of this State, or so much and such parts thereof as shall seem to them practicable and expedient, excepting always such portions of the law as have been already reported upon by the commissioners of practice and pleadings, or are embraced within the scope of their reports." This work was to be divided into three portions; one containing the political code, another the civil code, and a third the penal code.

The codes of civil and criminal procedure, as reported complete by the commissioners of practice and pleadings, were designed to embrace all the law of this State respecting remedies in the judicial tribunals, civil and criminal, including the law of evidence. There then remained the vast body of substantive law; that is to say, the law of civil rights and obligations affecting all the transactions of men with each other in their private relations, the law of crimes and punishments, and the law of government, including every branch of administrative and political action. This body of substantive law, the Legislature, by the act of 1857, declared should be contained in the three codes—political, civil, and penal, and to them the commissioners of the code have ever since devoted themselves.

Their first act was to prepare and report to the Legislature a general analysis of the codes projected by them. After this, their efforts were next directed to the preparation of the political code. This was divided into four parts. The first declared what persons composed the people of the State, and the political rights and duties of all persons subject to its jurisdiction; the second defined the territory of the State and its civil divisions; the third related to the general government of the State, the functions of its public officers, its general police and civil polity; and the fourth related to the local government of counties, cities, towns, and villages. The draft having been made, was distributed among the judges and other competent persons for examination; and after that the commissioners re-examined their work, and considered such suggestions as had been made to them; and the whole, as finally agreed upon by them, was reprinted and distributed to the judges and other officers before being presented to the Legislature. The political code, thus drawn and revised, was presented to the Legislature on the 10th April, 1860.

A few days afterwards, by an act passed on the 16th April, 1860, they were requested to prepare a book of forms adapted to the code of civil procedure. This duty was performed by them, and the required forms were submitted to the Legislature on the 30th March, 1861.

On the 5th April, 1862, the commissioners having prepared the draft of the civil code, distributed it to the judges and others for examination, and on the 2nd April, 1864, they in like manner distributed the draft of the penal code.

* [The act directs the commissioners to prepare three codes—the political code, the civil code, and the penal code.]

Having re-examined these two codes, and considered such suggestions as had been made, they have finally revised and agreed upon them.

The penal code is herewith laid upon the tables of the members of the Senate and Assembly. The civil code is in the hands of the printer, and will shortly be completed, and in like manner furnished to the members of the two Houses. But as the term of office of the commissioners will expire before the close of the present session of the Legislature, it is not possible to make the required distribution among the judges, surrogates, and county clerks in time for the more formal presentation of the civil and penal codes to the Legislature for adoption.

The penal code thus prepared defines all the crimes for which, according to the law of this State, persons can be punished, and the punishment for the same. In preparing it the commissioners kept the following objects in view:—First, to bring within the compass of a single volume the whole body of the law of crimes and punishments; second, to supply deficiencies and correct errors in the present definitions of crimes; third, to make the relative degrees of punishment more nearly equal to the relative degrees of crime; and, fourth, to define and punish acts deserving of punishment, but not punishable by the existing law.

The civil code was required to embrace the laws of personal rights and relations, of property, and of obligations.

It has four general divisions—the first relating to persons, the second to property, the third to obligations, and the fourth containing general provisions relating to these different subjects. In the execution of this vast undertaking, the commissioners have endeavoured to bring together, and arrange in order, all the general rules known to our law upon the subjects contained within the scope of such a code, rejecting which are obsolete or unsuitable to our present condition, and adding such others as appeared necessary or desirable.

The first division, it will be seen, defines the civil condition of different persons in the State, adults, minors, persons of unsound mind, and Indians; enumerates their personal rights; declares their personal relations, under the various topics of marriage, divorce, husband, wife, parent, child, guardian, ward, master, and servant.

The second division contains the laws respecting property, real and personal, the various interests or estates therein, the modes of acquisition by occupancy, accession, transfer, will, or succession; the restrictions on alienation and accumulation, the conditions and qualifications of ownership; uses and powers; the making, interpretation, and execution of wills, and various special provisions relating to corporations, copyright, shipping, and the rules of navigation. The third division embraces the whole subject of obligations, whether arising from contract or the operation of law, their definition, interpretation, transfer, and extinction, whether by performance, offer of performance, prevention of performance, or otherwise; the object and consideration of contracts, the parties thereto, and their consent, whether freely given or obtained by duress, menace, fraud, undue influence, or mistake; and after these general subjects, the particular subjects are considered of sale, exchange, deposit, loan, hiring, employment, service, carriage, trust, agency, partnership, insurance, indemnity, suretyship, pledge, mortgage, lien, and commercial paper. The fourth division specifies the different kinds of relief afforded for the violation of private rights, and the means of securing their observance, whether compensatory, specific, or preventive, and the measure of damages, when compensation is the rule. This division contains also provisions concerning the special relation of debtor and creditor, and concerning nuisances, and enumerates and explains various maxims of jurisprudence.

In all this immense range of subjects, while it has been the general purpose of the commissioners to give the law as it now exists, they have kept in mind the injunction of the constitution to "specify such alterations and amendments therein as they shall deem proper." In obedience to this command of the organic law, they have specified various alterations and amendments which they consider proper to be adopted. These are mentioned in the notes to the different sections, where the reasons for recommending them are generally given.

For all these the commissioners beg leave to refer to the notes themselves. To detail them here would swell this report to an inconvenient length, and, therefore, three only will be mentioned. In the first division, the commissioners have endeavoured to secure the equal rights of married women in respect to their children and their property, abolishing at the same time both dower and curtesy; and they have introduced an article on adoption, by which they have provided that the substituted parent may have all the rights, and be subject to all the responsibilities, of the real one, who, having once voluntarily renounced his parental rights, should not be permitted to resume them when the affections have grown into the new relation. In the second division, the commissioners have aimed at an assimilation, to the utmost extent possible, of the laws of real and personal property, by reducing the law of real estate to the simplicity of personal, wherever it could be done without the disturbance of existing rights, establishing for both the same rules of succession.

The commissioners will not presume to think that, in the preparation of the codes, they have foreseen all the cases which can arise in the multifarious affairs of men, or that they have even collected all the general rules which have been announced from the bench in the past history of our law. Some may have been overlooked, some may have been omitted, from a mistaken belief that they were obsolete or inapplicable to our present condition, or were contrary to other rules of greater importance, that ought to be retained.

All that the commissioners profess is, that they have endeavoured to collect those general rules known to our law which are applicable to our present circumstances, and ought to be continued. They trust that they have arranged these rules in a manner which will be approved by the scientific student, while it will help the lawyer and the citizen to an easier, if not a better, knowledge of the law; and they flatter themselves, that for the unforeseen cases which are certain to arise, there are general principles, rules of interpretation, and analogies, which will serve as guides for judicial decision.

The question, whether a code is desirable, is simply a question between written and unwritten law.

That this was ever debatable is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of jurisprudence. If the law is a thing to be obeyed, it is a thing to be known; and if it is to be known, there can be no better, not to say no other, method of making it known than of writing and publishing it. If a written constitution is desirable, so are written laws. The same reasons which affect the one, affect also the other. There may be countries where the conflicts between the different orders in a State render a written definition of their relative rights a difficult or an impossible task; and there, of course, a written constitution is not likely to be attempted; and because a written constitution is not thought desirable, written laws are supposed to be undesirable. These reasons have no application to this country. We have no orders in the State, no classes of society clashing with each other. The will of the people is the supreme law; that will is fitly expressed by their written constitution and their written laws. It should seem, indeed, to have no other fit expression.

There are those who argue, that an unwritten law is more favourable to liberty than a written one. The contrary should seem to be more consonant with reason. It can scarcely be thought favourable to the liberty of the citizen, that he should be governed by laws of which he is ignorant, and it can as little be thought, that his knowledge of the laws is promoted by their being kept from print, or from authentic statement in a written form.

Whatever is known to the judge or to the lawyer can be written, and whatever has been written in the treatises of lawyers, or the opinions of judges, can be written in a systematic code.

It is no answer, to say that nothing can be written which will not be susceptible of different interpretations. That may be true. But it is no more susceptible of different interpretations when written in a code, than when written in the reports. On the contrary, when expressed with care, for the very purpose of stating a rule which is to govern all cases alike, there is more likelihood of precision in language than when expressed with reference to a particular case.

For these eight years the commissioners have been engaged in the preparation of the codes with which they were charged by the Legislature of 1857. The task which they undertook was untried and difficult. No code of the common law of America or of England had ever before been attempted. How they have acquitted themselves it is not for them to say. Their work is before the Legislature and the people. If it shall effect half the good which the commissioners have ventured to hope from it, and the thought of which has cheered them through their long task, they will be rewarded.

The codes which the commissioners have thus prepared, together with the codes of civil and criminal procedure heretofore submitted by the commissioners on practice and pleadings, complete that work of codification which was contemplated by the constitution of 1846; and when the same shall have been considered and sanctioned by the Legislature, the people of New York will have the whole body of their laws in a written and systematic form, as full, at least, the commissioners venture to think, as the code of any other people.

In the last months of their service, when their task was well nigh ended, and while the sheets of the civil code were passing through the press, one of the members of the commission was taken away by death. On the 25th December, 1864, after an illness of two days, Mr. Noyes died, to the inexpressible grief of his associates; having been suddenly struck down in the fullness of life, leaving to the surviving commissioners the mournful duty of signing their names, without his, to this last report of their common labours.

All which is respectfully submitted.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday, April 24.

DUTY ON ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS' CERTIFICATES.

Mr. Denman postponed the motion which stood in his name for this evening, for the abolition of the annual duty upon certificates taken out by attorneys, solicitors, and proctors in England and Ireland, and by writers to the signet, solicitors, agents, attorneys, and procurators in Scotland, until Friday, the 19th May.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1861.

Mr. Murray asked the Attorney-General whether it was intended to introduce in this session any bill to carry out the resolutions reported to the House by the select committee appointed to inquire into the working of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861.

The Attorney-General, considering the magnitude and importance of this subject, did not think it possible to give any engagement on the part of the Government that a bill would be introduced during the present session. All he would undertake to say was, that the recommendation of the committee would, without any loss of time, receive the best consideration of the Government, with a view to introduce, as speedily as possible, such a measure as it should seem to them expedient to adopt.

Tuesday, April 25.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS FEES BILL.

Mr. Hankey moved the second reading of this bill. He thought that the expenditure involved in the working of the Charity Commission should not be wholly charged upon the taxation of the country. It did appear to him that the charities should bear the expense of such business as was formerly done by the Court of Chancery at a great expense, but was now transacted by the commissioners. In every other case litigants, or those who resorted to a court, paid the expense of the proceedings; but in this case the charities were totally exonerated from expense, which was thrown entirely upon the nation. He did not think that this was right; and the object of the present bill was to establish a juster system, by imposing a scale of fees upon the business transacted by the commissioners for the charities throughout the country. The nation at large was not interested in the business done on behalf of local charities; and it was, therefore, contrary to sound policy that the nation should bear the expense. When Lord Lyndhurst brought in the bill establishing the Charity Commission, he intended that the system should be self-supporting. And when it was resolved to throw the expense upon the nation, it was supposed that this could never exceed 5000*l.* per annum. But, as a matter of fact, the annual expense was now 20,000*l.*, and this was an increasing item. Why should not that expenditure be borne by those who were really interested in and benefited by the action of the Charity Commissioners, whose advice and assistance were of the greatest assistance to the charities?

Sir M. Peto moved that the bill should be read a second time that day six months. He thought that the cost of a department of the Government should be borne out of the taxation of the country, and should not be charged upon the charities. A question of this kind should be dealt with by the Government, if it were to be dealt with at all. The hon. member had entirely failed to shew that there was any real necessity for such a measure, which aimed at imposing a tax upon the poorest classes of the community.

Mr. Selwyn seconded the amendment. The bill seemed to be objectionable in detail, more objectionable still from the circumstances under which it was introduced, and most objectionable of all in principle. It was needless to trouble the House about the details of the measure; but he thought some credit was due to the hon. member for the ingenuity with which he managed to evade the objections to a private member introducing a taxing bill. The provisions of the bill were indefinite and incomprehensible, and the measure was further objectionable from the fact that it proposed to impose a tax upon the poor inmates of charitable institutions at a time when they were all looking forward to a remission of taxation.

Mr. F. S. Powell opposed the bill.

Mr. Bruce said, that although he wished that his hon. friend would not press the bill to a division, yet he could not agree in the arguments which had been urged against it. There was much in the bill which had already been recognised by the greatest authorities on both sides of the House. Under the bill introduced by the late Lord Lyndhurst when Lord Chancellor, the expenses of the commission were to be borne by the charities. The bill introduced by Lord Cranworth in 1851 contained provisions similar to those of the present bill. It appeared to him to be an intelligible principle that a portion of the expense connected with the management of charities should be chargeable upon the charities. But this bill proposed that the larger portion of the expenditure should be borne not by the charities which had profited by the management of the commissioners, but by those who acted in accordance with the act of Parliament, and sent in their returns. The greater portion of the cost would be thrown upon charities for doing that which had been made necessary for the purpose of supplying information to Parliament. The whole question was one which would have to be dealt with by the House in a comprehensive spirit sooner or later; for it could not be denied that, while many charities were useful, there were others of which it might be said that they were mischievous. He hoped his hon. friend would consent to withdraw the bill.

The bill was then negatived without a division.

THE REPEAL OF OBSOLETE ACTS OF PARLIAMENT.

In reply to Mr. Hadfield,

The Attorney-General said that a bill was in preparation for the repeal of obsolete acts of Parliament, and, if possible, would be introduced during the present session of Parliament.

THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY (VENERIAN) TEST BILL.

After a few words from Mr. Neate, this bill was read a second time.

The Mortgage Debentures (on recomittal) Bill was passed through committee.

A resolution on the subject of Mortgage Debentures Stamps, and also a resolution respecting Land Debentures Stamps, passed through committee.

The Greenwich Hospital Bill and the Railway Classes Bill were severally introduced and read a first time.

Wednesday, April 26.

INNS OF COURT BILL.

Sir G. Bowyer, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that the benchers of the Inns of Court exercised a very important jurisdiction of a criminal nature. They had power to hear and determine complaints and charges against their own members; to refuse admission to their Inn of Court; they could, after a student had complied with all the regulations of the house, refuse, upon charges against his character, to call him to the bar, thus inflicting on him very severe punishment, and stigmatising his character; they could also expel members. But the most important power was that of disbarring; that was to say, expelling from the legal profession barristers, even though they had the rank of Queen's counsel. Such a jurisdiction ought to be exercised by a tribunal every way qualified to discharge such functions. The jurisdiction in these cases was exercised by the whole body of the benchers. Lincoln's-inn had 60 benchers; the Inner Temple 45; the Middle Temple 36; and Gray's-inn 20. Cases heard before such numerous bodies as these could not be satisfactorily disposed of. In the first place, the tribunal was necessarily a shifting one. The same cases were heard by one set of benchers on one day, and by another set of benchers on another. Not long ago it was shewn, that in a case in which a member of that House was concerned, on each day of the trial there was a great variation in the court—A. and B. hearing it on one day, C. and D. the next, and so on all through the alphabet; and that some of the benchers who determined the case were not present at all during the hearing. It was said, indeed, they had an opportunity of reading the shorthand writer's notes; but that was not a satisfactory state of things. There were other objections to the present tribunal.

One was, that the benchers had no power to administer an oath; another was, that they had no power to compel either the attendance of witnesses or the production of documents. An important case, illustrating the necessity for the first of those powers, occurred some years ago. Mr. Whittle Harvey was refused his call to the bar. The same case was afterwards brought before a committee of that House, composed of very distinguished members. The committee held that Mr. Whittle Harvey was entitled to be called to the bar, and they recorded in their report the reason why they had come to a different conclusion from that of the benchers, viz. because they had the power of compelling the attendance of a particular witness, whereas the benchers had not. Again: when a charge was made, the accuser went before the benchers with his evidence and his case prepared, but the defendant must request it as a favour that his witnesses would come forward on his behalf, as there was no power of compelling them to do so. But another power essential to the administration of justice, which the benchers did not possess, was that of committing for contempt, and maintaining the order of their proceedings. During a late important investigation before an Inn of Court, a witness having got possession of a document that was before the court, refused to give it up. The benchers had no remedy. The police were called in, and the result was, that the judges and the parties all went before the inspector of police at the station in Fleet-street. He proposed that instead of cases being heard before the whole body of the benchers, the benchers should have power to select a judicial committee for their determination, and that such judicial committee should be armed with all the powers that belonged to a court of law—that it should be able to administer an oath, to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and also to punish for contempt. Last year he introduced a bill very similar to the present one, but he had sought to obviate the objections that were raised to the former measure. He proposed to leave it in the option of the benchers to refer or not refer cases affecting discipline to a judicial committee. But he proposed that they should not be allowed to exercise the highly penal powers of refusing admission to the inn, of expelling from the inn, of refusing to call students who were entitled to their call, and of disbarring, except through the medium of a judicial committee. His bill provided, that if both parties concurred the case might be heard in private; but that, unless both concurred, it should be heard in public.

Mr. Roebuck, in seconding the motion, said he thought the bill an exceedingly good one. The former attempt of his honourable friend at legislation on that subject was of a different character, and he had been quite prepared to oppose it. The present measure, however, would give such powers to the Inns of Court as they now wanted, and as would render them what they ought to be—an efficient judicial tribunal. He must add, that when the bill came into committee he should invite the consideration of the Attorney-General to one of its clauses, by which it was provided, that the Inns of Court should be allowed to choose five persons as a judicial committee, power being reserved to the individual charged to challenge three of them.

Mr. Locke did not think any case had been made out for this bill, and moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. Neate seconded the amendment, because he considered it desirable that the whole constitution and powers of the Inns of Court should be made the subject of comprehensive legislation.

The Attorney-General did not offer any objection to the second reading of the bill, without, however, committing himself as to the course he should take if it reached a later stage without amendment. He felt regret that the Inns of Court had not taken a clear and decided course in this matter, in order to assist the House in coming to some definite conclusion. He thought it was not satisfactory that this matter should be divorced from other important questions relating to the same subject. He referred to the Commission of 1854, and to what had since been done. They had not moved with very great rapidity; yet these learned societies had shewn, at least, a very considerate and zealous disposition to make important improvements in the direction pointed out.

Sir G. Bowyer replied.

Mr. Locke withdrew his amendment, and the bill was then read a second time.

THE LAWS AFFECTING RAILWAYS, BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Now ready, in one thick vol. royal 8vo., price 11. 15s. cloth boards.
SIR W. HODGES'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW OF RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.

"The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

PHILLIPS'S LAW OF COPYRIGHT.

In 8vo., price 12s. cloth.

THE LAW of COPYRIGHT in WORKS of LITERATURE and ART, and in the Application of Designs. With the Statutes relating thereto. By CHARLES PALMER PHILLIPS, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister at Law. In 8vo. 1863.

"Mr. Phillips has shown, not only great diligence in collecting cases bearing upon the various topics which he has treated, but considerable judgment in the manner in which he has dealt with them. He has spared no pains to make his work reliable as a legal text-book, and at the same time equally useful to publishers, authors, artists, and other persons who are interested in works of literature, art, or design. In a word, such a book has long been wanted, and Mr. Phillips has given abundant proof of his ability to meet the desideratum."—Solicitors' Journal, Nov. 14, 1863.

STARKIE'S LAW OF EVIDENCE.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of EVIDENCE. By THOMAS STARKIE, Esq. Fourth Edition, with very considerable alterations and additions; incorporating the Statutes and reported Cases to the time of publication. By G. M. DOWDESWELL and J. G. MALCOLM, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. In 1 vol. royal 8vo., 1853, price 14. 16s. cloth.

In the parliamentary debate on disqualified witnesses (House of Commons, Feb. 12, 1861), referring to the case of Maden v. Caineck, Sir G. C. Lewis said, "He would read from Starkie on Evidence, which was known to be a standard work upon the subject, a statement of the law as applicable to the case (vide Examination as to Religious Belief, pp. 115, 116). That is a clear statement of the rule of law upon the subject."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 6, 1865.

It is much to be regretted that the useful operation of the act of 1854, giving power to the Courts of common law to allow interrogatories to be put to the parties in an action at law, should have been in any degree lessened by conflicting views as to the interpretation of its terms; but there are few subjects on which more doubt has been felt, or on which the decisions by the Courts have differed more frequently, or by nicer shades, than on the questions, whether the right to interrogate is confined to those matters as to which a discovery may be sought in equity; and whether, if it is so confined, the objection to any interrogatories that infringe the rule, more especially as to questions which have a tendency to criminate the party interrogated, is, in the first instance, to the interrogatory, against its being allowed to be put at all, or arises on the refusal to answer, after the ten days given by the statute to answer by affidavit have elapsed. The differences of opinion that have existed on these questions amongst the learned judges, whose office it is to declare the law, have proved to be a source of serious expense to suitors, and of great difficulty to practitioners engaged in advising on such matters. Soon after the passing of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, an opinion very generally prevailed that the statute intended that the party might be interrogated without reference to the rules of equity as to discovery, and that the same questions might be put as if the party were under examination as a witness at the trial of the cause. In Osborne v. The London Dock Company (10 Exch. 698), a case where the interrogatories proposed, manifestly had a tendency to criminate the party to whom they were addressed, the Court of Exchequer decided that the questions might be put; and, on counsel arguing that discovery in sect. 51 meant such discovery as could be had in equity on a bill of discovery, Baron Parke observed, that the language of the 51st section was much more extensive in its signification, and had no such limitation as that contended for. That the 50th section, which empowered the Court to order the production of documents, said that it should be done upon the affidavit of the party applying for the document, to the production of which he was entitled, for the purpose of discovery, or otherwise; and that the 51st section said that the party might be interrogated as to any matter as to which discovery might be sought. That it did not say that the power was limited to cases in which a bill of discovery would lie; and Baron Alderson observed, that the proceeding was analogous to that of the examination of a witness at the trial; and that it therefore seemed to him that the same rule should be followed; Baron Parke adding—"The plaintiff must be put upon his oath, and, when he finds any question presses him, he must object to it." And Baron Alderson then proceeds to point out at some length, that the party has ten days given him by the act to determine whether he will answer the interrogatories; and that if he refuse, then an oral examination may be directed; and that when the question is put to him orally, he may then object, that he believes it has a tendency to criminate him. The case of Whately v. Crowter (5 El. & Bl. 709) followed at a very short interval, and there it was evidently taken to be the practice, as a general rule at all events, that if interrogatories were objected to, the course was to consider and determine the objection at once, on the application for interrogatories, and not to have the questions put, and allow the party interrogated ten days to determine whether he should answer them or not. And, with regard to discovery, the Court of Queen's Bench appeared to be unanimously of opinion that it meant such discovery only as could be had in equity; and Lord Campbell, in giving his judgment, said that the object of the enactment was to obviate the necessity of commencing a fresh suit in a court of equity, for the purpose of obtaining a discovery in aid of an action at law: that to effectuate that, it had been enacted, that by leave of the court or a judge, a party to a suit might deliver interrogatories in writing upon any matter as to which discovery might be sought: that it was too wide an interpretation to say, that every question might be asked on interrogatories which might be asked if the party were a witness at the trial, and that he, Lord Campbell, thought that interrogatories must be confined to matters which might be discovered by a bill of discovery in equity. The same views were adhered to in Edwards v. Wakefield (6 El. & Bl. 468), as the following extract from the judgment of the Court shews:—"We think that we ought, at all events, to hold that discovery, under the 51st section, is limited by the words 'upon any matter as to which discovery may be sought,' to the cases where a discovery could be given in equity." And in Moor v. Roberts (2 C. B., N. S., 671), which followed in the Common Pleas, the views expressed by the Court of Queen's Bench were brought forward in argument, and do not appear to have been dissented from by any of the judges of the Common Pleas. And though the interrogatories were in that case refused, without any distinct reference to the rules of equity as to discovery, Chief Justice Cockburn observed, that the obvious intention of the 51st section was to supersede the necessity of recourse being had in all cases to a court of equity, for the purpose of aiding by discovery the proceedings in an action at common law, and to give the courts of common law power to afford the same sort of assistance to suitors there. After these cases there came, at a long interval, the case of Tupling v. Ward (6 H. & Norm. 749), which was an action for libel, and in which the plaintiff had proposed to interrogate the defendant as to his being the author of the libel, and the Court of Exchequer was pressed by the previous decision of the same court in Osborne v. The London Dock Company; and it was urged, that, on the interpretation there put on the statute, the party interrogated might have questions put to him, as if he were being examined at Nisi Prius; and Boyle v. Wiseman (10 Exch. 647) was cited, where it had been held that a party to a suit cannot object to be sworn and examined at the trial, on the ground that the only relevant question which could be put to him would tend to criminate him, but that he must be sworn, and on his oath claim his privilege. The Court, however, refused to allow the interrogatories to be put, not apparently as following any rule of equity as to discovery, but as in the exercise of a discretion given them by the statute; and Martin, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "We are all of opinion, that in the exercise of the authority and discretion given to us by the 51st section of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, such interrogatories ought not to be allowed. It was scarcely contended that the defendant was bound to answer them; but it was urged that the interrogatories ought to be administered, leaving the defendant to refuse to answer if he thought fit. Without laying down any general rule on the subject, we think that, in cases of this kind, it would be unfair to permit a question which the party is clearly not bound to answer; the object being either to compel him to answer when not bound, or to refuse, and so create a prejudice against him. We, therefore, think these interrogatories ought not to be allowed." This case, therefore, restricted that width of interpretation animadverted upon by Lord Campbell, which gave the rule, that every question might be put to a party on interrogatories which might be put to him as a witness under examination at the trial. The wider interpretation was, however, reverted to by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Bartlett v. Lewis (31 L. J., C. P., 230), where there was a long string of interrogatories, some twenty-nine in number, tending to impute to the defendant fraudulent concealment and felony under the bankrupt laws, and which were allowed, the questions being such as might have been put to the defendant had he been called as a witness at the trial. And Chief Justice Erle said—"It is clear that these are questions which might be put to the defendant if he were in the witness box; and there he would be bound, if he desired to protect himself against answering them, to pledge his oath that they tended to criminate him;" and Mr. Justice Willes also expressed his opinion that the party to whom interrogatories are administered is placed in the same position as a witness at the trial; and he explained that Tupling v. Ward probably did not amount to more than that, under the peculiar circumstances of that case, the Court would not allow the interrogatories to be put. Both Chief Justice Erle and Mr. Justice Willes also expressed a strong opinion that the courts of law were to administer justice in the matter of interrogatories by analogy to their own proceedings, and not by analogy to those of courts of equity. It would appear that Mr. Justice Byles concurred in allowing the interrogatories mainly in deference to the case of Chester v. Wortley (17 C. B., N. S., 709), which he considered to be in point, and to the opinion of the other members of the court. The Court of Common Pleas, however, in the still more recent case of Stern v. Sevastopulo (32 L. J., C. P., 268), in an action of slander, where the words alleged to have been spoken contained several wide imputations against the character of the defendant, refused to allow interrogatories which went to charge the defendant with being guilty of the slander, although it was urged that the questions were such as might have been put to the defendant as a witness at the trial; and, in resisting that argument, the Court fell back on the principle enunciated in Tupling v. Ward, that the Courts have a general discretion in the matter of interrogatories; and the Court of Common Pleas has, therefore, in effect, now added the weight of its authority to that of the Court of Exchequer, that some restriction must be placed on that width of interpretation complained of by Lord Campbell, and which gave as the rule, that a party might be interrogated as if he were a witness in the box. We add to this, that the Court of Queen's Bench has just recently held, in the case of Pye v. Butterfield (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 226), that, in the exercise of the powers conferred by sect. 51, in allowing interrogatories, the Court will take as a guide the rules and principles acted upon in the courts of equity as to "bills of discovery," although it will not consider itself to be fettered by those rules. We cite the following passage from the judgment of Chief Justice Cockburn:—"In the exercise of the powers recently conferred upon this Court, it seems to me that we ought to be governed by the principles which have been recognised in the courts in which this branch of our jurisprudence was originally planted, nurtured, and has grown up. This power was given to us in order that the complication of business caused by the necessity of having recourse to other courts should be prevented; and when the Legislature gave us such power, it must be taken to have done so with the knowledge of the rules according to which the power has been administered in those other courts; and, therefore, whether we are free to exercise our own discretion, or whether it was intended that we should act in accordance with the courts of equity, I think we ought to abide by the principles and rules of those courts." The result of all these cases, taken as a whole, appears to be, that the Courts have a general discretion in the matter of interrogatories—a general discretion which will always be ready to prevent the too rigorous application of any previous definition of their powers, and which will be guided and governed, though never absolutely controlled, by the principles of equitable discovery. And with regard to questions which have a tendency to criminate, we think it may now be said that the inclination of the Courts is to disallow, in the first instance, interrogatories which manifestly are such as the party sought to be interrogated is not bound to answer. It was on that principle that Tupling v. Ward and Baker v. Lane (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 117) were decided in the Exchequer; and Stern v. Sevastopulo in the Common Pleas, went very near to the same. And such we apprehend is to be a sound rule of practice; it avoids the inconsistency of the Court ordering the party to answer that which he manifestly is not bound to answer; it prevents the possible delay of waiting ten days, and then having the party orally examined, if he takes the course of simply not answering; it saves the additional cost of a second inquiry; it not only prevents delay, and saves expense, but also arrests those shafts prepared in the closet, apart from that moral control of a public audience, which checks the tongue of the boldest advocate in open court—shafts which too frequently are aimed without any other object than to annoy and intimidate, and only serve that mischievous purpose.

THE LAW MAGAZINE ON LAW REPORTING.

THE new number of the Law Magazine contains an interesting article on the Legal Position of the Church of England, and an heretical essay on Criminal Responsibility, which we may take another opportunity of noticing. Our present business is to make some extracts from an able paper on the Bar scheme for the amendment of the present system of Law Reporting, in which we think that the present position of the question, and the interests of the profession with regard to it are very fairly discussed:—

“The danger that has first to be encountered is the fear that the attempt to establish the proposed set of reports may increase the present evils, by adding another to the six existing sets. The scheme endeavours to avoid this danger, by proposing what, in effect, would be a fusion of all the existing regular reports, consisting at present of no less than fifteen independent publications, costing in the aggregate about 30% per annum; the Chancery series alone costing at least 11%. This fusion, if it could be accomplished, would, without question, be a result in itself worth the struggle; but its success must, we conceive, depend upon the consent of the reporters. The publishers, we believe, care but little for the regular reports; the circulation has become so diminished through the effect of competition, that there is but little profit to be made out of them now-a-days, and the reporters have become the persons chiefly interested. Can the consent of the regular reporters be procured? It is hardly to be expected that parties in their position will disclose the real extent and value of their interests, and we do not see that the council have means at their disposal for overcoming anything like a general or combined opposition. In fact, as the scheme proposes (rule 11) (though this proposal is not specially noticed in the address), that the appointment of reporters should be subject to the approval of the chief presiding judge, it may be taken for granted that the judges, as a body, would not sanction appointments made in disregard of the interests of the present reporters. The council must, therefore, in the first instance, deal with the existing reporters. And it seems to us that their consent can only be expected, if it be made reasonably clear that their interests will be advanced by the change—assuming, of course, their ability and willingness to discharge the duties in the manner which will be required under the proposed system. To enable the council to do this, they must depend upon obtaining, as a preliminary, the support of the profession to a large extent. The address does not, indeed, in express terms, speak, as the scheme does, of the interests of the regular reporters being the first to be considered. It speaks rather vaguely of the establishment of one set of reports upon the basis of a fair regard for existing interests. This might imply an intention to disregard the regular reporters, and might point to an arrangement with the Law Journal; but we have no doubt that the intention of the address is to carry into effect the precise recommendations of the scheme, and that, for the reason we have given as to the approval of the judges being necessary, any other course would be impracticable. It may, therefore, be concluded, that if any regular reporter should be left out, it would only be in consequence of his own unreasonable refusal to come in. In arrangements which are proposed for the benefit of the profession and the public, obstructions by individuals on the mere ground of private interest, would hardly be recognised by the judges or the profession as the legitimate exercise of a right; and though we cannot conceive that any regular reporter would prove merely obstructive, yet if such a case should occur, we think he ought not to be considered as entitled to stop the scheme by his veto, nor ought he to complain if he is left to make himself conspicuous by his absence. It may be an unpleasant truth, but the fact is not to be gainsaid, that if the profession came forward in sufficient numbers to establish the scheme, subscription to the proposed reports would probably imply withdrawal of subscriptions from all others, and we do not know of any existing series of regular reports that could be profitably continued after a permanent withdrawal of even 500 subscribers. The scheme not only contemplates, as we read it, the fusion of the regular reports, but also (rule 26) provides that arrangements may be made by the council, which, for an adequate consideration, shall lead to the discontinuance of any existing set of reports. This, we imagine, is intended to apply to the Law Journal. The weekly series are not, and do not profess to be, of such a character as could be properly dealt with by the council with a view to the establishment of a permanent series. A fusion or amalgamation of the regular reports and the Law Journal would, in our judgment, be a most desirable thing for the profession and the public, and the council would, no doubt, act wisely in striving to accomplish it, if in their power. But here the practical difficulties will probably be greater than with the regular reporters. The Law Journal has become a successful commercial undertaking, and is now yielding a larger profit to its proprietors than, we believe, any other set of reports, and these parties cannot be expected to sacrifice themselves for the public good. We do not see our way to suggest any definite plan which would be satisfactory. The purchase of the proprietary interest, by payment of a sum down, would be out of the question. The scheme (rule 26) appears to limit the consideration to be paid for the relinquishment of any set of existing reports to a payment, during a limited period, out of profits, to be postponed to payment of the necessary expenses of printing, sale, and management, and the guaranteed salaries of the reporters. The payment of a consideration in such a mode is one to which the proprietors of the Law Journal, in its present state of financial prosperity, would be naturally unwilling to submit. At the same time, there are considerations affecting the position of the Law Journal which cannot be lost sight of. As a commercial property, it must be subject to all the risks and contingencies which affect the commerce in which it is engaged. If the interests of the profession and the public require that a radical change be made in our system of law reporting, by substituting professional control for commercial management, the consequences of that change, whatever they be, must be submitted to by the Law Journal. The profession and the public have a right to require to be served in the manner which they deem best for their own interest, and those who desire to profit by serving them must be guided by events as they arise. If the Law Journal resolve, as possibly it may, to stand aloof, let us consider what may happen. The proposed reports would be more complete and comprehensive than those of the Law Journal now are, or, with reporters inadequately remunerated, ever could be. Not only will they comprise the reports of all the courts, including the appellate, but they will be so conducted, if we rightly understand the scheme, that the decisions of the year shall, as far as practicable, be published within the year—a result never yet attempted by the Law Journal, or any other set of reports; but a result easily attainable under a management which does not seek to realise a trade profit; for it is plain to our minds, that when a case has been argued and decided, it is ready to be reported; and we are satisfied, that under a well-arranged system of reporting (of which adequate remuneration to reporters would be an essential element), the proper preparation of the report need not involve a long interval of time, though it would involve the personal attendance of the reporter throughout the argument and the judgment, together with prompt and convenient access to all necessary papers. The Law Journal is, beyond all doubt, a valuable publication, so far as regards its reports of cases in the courts of common law, but it is not considered to be equally so as regards its reports of cases in the courts of equity, or the appellate courts. This fact is notorious; and the dissatisfaction that is felt by practitioners in equity at the deficiencies of some, at least, of the regular Chancery reports, and the character of the equity reports in the Law Journal, may have led to the impression, which we know has been felt in some quarters, that the recent movement was only that of the equity bar, and was not supported by the common-law bar. In making these observations as to the Law Journal, we are only referring to facts, as they affect the public interests. The reasons for these facts are equally notorious with the facts themselves. In the common-law courts the Law Journal has the advantage of access to, and the use of, the judges' written and revised judgments; but it does not enjoy the same advantage, to the same extent, in the courts of equity. In these courts, as a rule, the judges only communicate their written and revised judgments to the regular reporter of their respective courts. This want of uniformity in the practice may well account for the different degrees of merit in the reports. If the proposed set were established and maintained according to their contemplated completeness and efficiency, a prejudicial effect might be produced, if not upon existing, at all events upon new, subscriptions; and a prudent regard for the probabilities and possibilities of the future would be matter of present concern to those interested in the Law Journal. Another consideration presents itself which should not be lost sight of. In the proposed scheme two important principles, the one dependent on the other, lie at the foundation of the difference between the existing and the new system—we mean the liberal remuneration of reporters, and the exclusion of all commercial profit. Experience seems to have shewn that, under a system of competition, the two cannot exist together. Now, in considering the amount of compensation to be paid for any proprietary interest, the question would have to be asked, how far are its profits affected by the amount of remuneration paid to its reporters? Could it fairly be expected of the profession, that they should pay a large compensation for trade profits which are realised at the expense of one class, and to the injury of the other.

The difficulties which beset the question are obviously many and great, but they spring naturally and legitimately from the interests which have to be dealt with. They will not be avoided by shutting our eyes to them. They lie in the path, and must be surmounted. The mode of surmounting them will, we think, be aided by discussion; that they are capable of being surmounted by mutual moderation and fairness, we are satisfied; that it is for the interest of the profession that they should be surmounted, we are satisfied also. And it lies with the profession itself to supply the means of surmounting them. If the profession generally feel the evils of the existing system, and, approving the proposed change, desire to see it brought about, their course is to support the council in the manner proposed, and means adequate to accomplish the object would be thereby at once brought into existence."

We think that the case in favour of the scheme of the bar committee is very fairly stated in the above extract; and it remains for both branches of the profession to consider whether or not it is their case. If they come to the conclusion that it is, now is the time to conquer their proverbial inertia, and to act promptly and energetically, for it is certain, that if the very great and disinterested efforts which have been made, and are being made, by the promoters of this most important reform, should now meet with a check, no fresh attempt will be made in the present generation, and for an indefinite time the profession must continue to endure the evils of the present most absurd practice.

The writer proceeds to draw, from a trumpety attempt on the part of the persons interested in the most recently established of the unauthorised reporting nuisances, viz. the New Reports, to advertise that publication, an inference which may involve some degree of truth, but which is not justified by the transaction in question. The dispute has since been taken into the Court of Chancery, and laughed out of court; it appearing that the sole ground of complaint on the part of the New Reports was, that in a long report of a case of Graham v. Wickham, before the Lords Justices, the reporter on behalf of The Jurist (whose original notes in short-hand of the arguments and judgments in the case were produced), finding that the report in the New Reports of the judgment of Lord Justice Turner was substantially the same with his own notes, had used the printed report of that judgment to abridge the labour of transcribing his short-hand notes, and had subsequently lent his manuscript so prepared to the gentleman who supplies the Law Times with reports of cases in the Court of Appeal in Chancery.

On this, the writer in the Law Magazine makes the following remarks:—

"The three reports would, upon perusal, appear to be what they profess and ought to be, the separate and independent reports of the several barristers under whose names they were published, and thereby accredited as authority. We are satisfied that no one reading the three reports, if he had occasion to do so, would, from the reports themselves, be led to suppose they were other than what they purported to be—the original reports of the barristers under the credit of whose names they are published. It would appear, however, that, in truth, there is only one original report of the judgment—that contained in the New Reports. The reporter for The Jurist, as the publisher of the New Reports alleges, pirated the judgment from the New Reports, altering it so as to make it appear his original^{*}; and then the reporter of the Law Times borrowed the notes of The Jurist reporter (not knowing that they were not original), and sent them to the Law Times, with, as he says, but few alterations, but nevertheless so altered as to make it appear as his original[†]. And the Law Times reporter seems to think it hard that anybody should think of complaining of what was done so innocently.

* This is not so: there was no "colourable" alteration.

† We have not the Law Times report before us, but we believe that this also is an error.

"The custom alluded to by Mr. Brooksbank, and the resort to which seems to be sanctioned by his employer, has long been known to exist, but we could hardly have expected to have had that construction so plainly confessed, and the judgment of the profession so challenged as to its propriety."

The history of the reports in the New Reports and The Jurist of the case of Graham v. Wickham in no degree justifies these remarks. The long statements in each publication of the facts and arguments in the case are admitted to be wholly original and independent, and when the original notes taken for The Jurist of the judgment (which alone formed the subject of dispute) were compared by Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood with the printed report, he observed that they were identical in substance, and nearly so in words. This, therefore, was not an instance of "only one original report" reappearing under another name. The two reports were really independent and original. The writer proceeds:—

"The privilege of the Bar in this matter of reporting is exceptional and peculiar, and very difficult to justify on principle.

"The present Lord Chancellor's statement of the privilege is—'That as soon as a report is published of any case, with the name of the barrister annexed to it, the report is accredited, and may be cited as an authority before any tribunal.'

"If, as it seems to be now contended for, a report may be published under the name of a barrister who knows nothing personally of the case, but has merely taken, with or without authority, the contents, in whole or in part, from a previously published report, or the notes of a brother barrister, surely it is high time that some influence were exerted on behalf of the profession and the public to put a stop to a system of such questionable propriety. Mark! it is the system we denounce, not the individuals who become engaged in it. A barrister who seeks employment as a reporter is remunerated, now-a-days, with such a miserable pittance for his services, that the proprietor cannot expect that he will be personally present in court every day from its sitting to its rising, as a reporter ought to be."

There can be no doubt that the existing system has a tendency to produce the evils here suggested, and, at best, involves no guarantee to the profession, that the enormous inconvenience of a multiplicity of competing reports is compensated by the certainty which the collation of independent reports would afford.

The article concludes with a note, refuting the impudently false assertion contained in the Law Times of the 22nd April, that the invitation to the Serjeants' Inn to send a representative to the Council for Law Reporting, "was rejected unanimously, all the judges, without exception, expressing their disapproval of the scheme," an assertion, which, in the face of an authoritative contradiction, is in the number of the 29th April, asserted to be "substantially correct," although it is well known that the judges have declined to interfere at present, only because they think that it would not be proper for them to do so in their official capacity, and that several of them have expressed their approval of the experiment.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Friday, April 28.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of this bill. He said that both in construction and in locality the existing courts were objectionable. The courts of law were at Westminster, but the chambers of the judges were in Serjeants'-inn; and it constantly happens that a judge sits half the day in court, and rises much earlier than would otherwise be necessary in order to go to chambers. In like manner the offices of the courts of law are scattered in different localities; and the offices connected with the courts of equity are equally scattered and equally inconvenient of access, so that business cannot be conducted without great peril of breaking appointments, and danger of counsel not being present when they are wanted. The sources from which the money required for the acquisition of the land and the building of the courts of justice were intended to be derived were three. First, a sum of 300,000*l.*, to be advanced by the Government as the price of the buildings and grounds which the Government would have received, and would have at their disposal when these courts had been erected—property which greatly exceeds that sum in point of value. The next source was the Sutors' Fund in the Court of Chancery. The Court of Chancery was not only a court of justice, but a great bank, into which considerable sums belonging to the suitors were paid. The Court of Chancery did, with regard to the moneys it received from the suitors, precisely what an ordinary banker does with respect to the money of his customers. The income resulting from the Chancery investments had been dealt with by Parliament, again and again, as money which belonged to the public, and which the public had a right to employ in any manner it pleased, and to regard it as standing in the same relation to itself as the profits of the banker stand to him. The profits resulting from these investments had been applied, under the authority of Parliament, to a great variety of purposes. Sometimes parts had been applied to buildings belonging to the Court of Chancery, at other times in part payment of the salaries of officials, and so on. In fact, there could be no doubt that Parliament regarded it as a public fund, to be devoted from time to time to such objects as might be deemed necessary for the public welfare. The funds representing the investment of the suitors' money from time to time amounted to a sum of 2,331,047l. That was not the fund with which this bill proposed to deal. It belonged to the suitors. But the profit had grown out of the dividends resulting from these investments, and belonged to the State, and amounted to 1,291,629l. The object of the bill was to take out of the fund 1,000,000l. of stock, which at 90 will raise 900,000l. The sum which it was desirable to raise was 1,500,000l., divisible into two parts. The first moiety of 750,000l. was to be applied as purchase money of the buildings and lands upon which the courts of justice and offices were proposed to be erected. The site was valued originally, in 1849, by Sir C. Barry and a surveyor of great local information, at 670,000l. It was afterwards valued by another surveyor at 678,000l. The property was subsequently valued by Mr. Hunt, a surveyor employed by the Government, and also by Mr. Pennethorne, architect of the Board of Works; and they put the extreme value at 700,000l. There was a margin of 50,000l. That leaves 400,000l. to be raised, in order to make up the sum of 1,500,000l.; and this sum of 400,000l. it was proposed to supply by a small tax on suitors in the courts of law, and on those who prove wills and take out letters of administration in the Probate Court; 1s. 6d. on every writ issued in an action, and 2s. 6d. on every grant of probate or administration, would be sufficient to produce more than 16,000l. a year. The sum of 400,000l. would be advanced by the Government, charging the courts of justice 3l. 5s. per cent., and then the sum of 16,000l. a year having been raised for fifty years, the principal and interest of the capital sum would be redeemed.

Lord St. Leonards had no objection whatever to the concentration of the law courts. Once the site was fixed upon, the proposal itself would receive no opposition at his hands. His noble and learned friend, indeed, in his zeal for the measure, had, he thought, over estimated some of the inconveniences and dangers connected with the existing system. Until he heard them enumerated, he had but a very faint conception of the miseries among which so many years of his life had been passed. His noble and learned friend had not yet attained the same age as himself, but yet he was not a bad specimen of how a man might face the terrible atmosphere in which, according to his own account, he had so long been doomed to live. His noble and learned friend had spoken of the fusion—or, as he should call it, the confusion—of law and equity, and seemed to think, that if the proposed concentration of the common law and equity courts were carried into effect, that object would be accomplished. When, however, the Court of King's Bench and the Court of the Lord Chancellor occupied a position in Westminster-hall in the closest contiguity to one another, not the slightest advance was made towards the amalgamation of the two distinct legal systems which they administered. He was entirely opposed, at all events, to the removal of the courts of equity. If this measure were carried, they would break in upon the rights of property to a greater extent than had ever been attempted during the course of the last century, and they would find it a most unexampled and a most dangerous proceeding. The Court of Chancery had no right to a single shilling of profit out of the funds now in question, which it held in trust for the benefit of the suitors. He disapproved altogether the proposal to take the Suitors' Fee Fund for building these courts.

The Duke of Argyll spoke in favour of the bill. Lord Cranworth approved the site chosen for the courts. Lord Redesdale approved of the bill. The bill was then read a second time.

COMMON LAW COURTS (FEES) BILL.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of this bill.

Lord Chelmsford thought that some of the provisions of the bill required alteration, but would reserve his objections for the committee.

The bill was then read a second time.

Tuesday, May 2.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

On the order of the day for going into committee on this bill,

Lord Redesdale said there were no powers in the bill for making adequate approaches to the courts of justice proposed to be built. 700,000l. was to be expended on the site, and the question was, whether another 700,000l. would not be required for making the approaches. And with regard to the buildings themselves, their Lordships had no estimate before them. He believed there never was a proposal on which so little explanation had been given. He moved that it be referred to a select committee, who should be empowered to report upon the question of approaches, and other points which needed elucidation.

Lord St. Leonards supported the amendment.

Earl Granville objected, that the Lord Chancellor could not find time to attend the committee.

The Earl of Hardwicke wished to know how the Government arrived at the conclusion, that seven acres of land in the heart of London could be purchased for 700,000l.

The Earl of Ellenborough said, that not only any private gentleman, but any prince—Cæsar himself—would be very imprudent to begin to build a great palace without an estimate. The House, however, was asked to build not one palace, but half a dozen, for the purpose of making comfortable accommodation for 3000 barristers, 2300 attorneys, and 15,000 gentlemen whom they called their staff. The matter did not much concern their Lordships, but would be for those who came after them. Their Lordships would never see this great palace, although they might have to pay a portion of the cost. They would never expatiate in those courts—they would never see the common law and equity lawyers flying into each other's arms, and effecting a fusion of law and equity, not by act of Parliament, but by casual intercourse as they walked through its ample passages. He felt most unwilling to remove the courts of common law from the position at Westminster which they had held from the time when they were first made stationary.

The Lord Chancellor said, that unquestionably their Lordships would never see an end of this work, if they never made a beginning. There had been all the inquiry possible, and all the calculation that could be obtained from the most experienced persons had been laid before Parliament. It was impossible to lay down what portion of the seven acres of land would be required or could be dispensed with. When the expense of the buildings and land was ascertained, he had no doubt a considerable portion of land would remain, part of which might be dedicated to the improvement of the approaches from the Strand.

Their Lordships then divided on the question that the bill be committed:—

Their Lordships then went into committee on the bill.

The clauses were agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE) BILL.

The House went into committee on this bill.

On clause 3,

Lord Chelmsford inquired whether the words of the clause were sufficient to insure a proper access from the Temple to the new courts, either by a tunnel or covered gallery.

The Lord Chancellor could assure his noble and learned friend, that a convenient access from the Temple to the new courts of law was to be, and should be, a part of the design.

The clauses were agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, April 27.

The Lancaster Court of Chancery Bill passed through committee.

The Land Drainage Supplemental Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Oxford University (Vinerian Foundation) Bill passed through committee.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND.

On the order of the day for the adjourned debate on this subject being read, the select committee, consisting of the following members, was agreed to:—Mr. Maguire, Mr. Cardwell, Lord Naas, Sir R. Peel, Mr. S. Fitzgerald, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Hunt, Mr. W. E. Forster, Lord C. Hamilton, Colonel Greville, Sir E. Grogan, Sir C. O'Loughlin, The O'Donoghue, Lord Dunkellin, Mr. Caird, Mr. George, and Mr. Bagwell. Power to send for persons, papers, and records. Five to be the quorum.

The Sewage Utilisation Bill passed through committee.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

The House went into committee on this bill, and the 19th clause (regulating the collection of fees) which had been postponed, was agreed to. The bill was ordered to be reprinted.

LAND DEBENTURES BILL.

This bill also was considered in committee, clause 18 was omitted, and a clause relating to stamps was inserted.

Monday, May 1.

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. Milner Gibson, in moving the second reading of this bill, referred to Mr. Scholefield's bill for the purpose of amending the law of partnership. The object was to enable persons to carry on business with unlimited liability, and to enter into partnership with others who should be liable only for a specific amount, designated limited partners. The measure contained various rules and restrictions, which rendered it necessary that it should embrace a great number of clauses, and it proposed, on the whole, to effect a very considerable change in the law of partnership. It passed through a select committee, the House having adopted its principle; but the difficulties were so hard to be surmounted that he abandoned the measure, an understanding having been come to between himself and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the question should receive the serious consideration of the Government. Under those circumstances, the Government had deemed it to be their duty to take the matter in hand, and it had occurred to them that the benefits to be derived from such a measure as that of his hon. friend might be secured by another mode of proceeding of a simpler character, and one which would be attended by a less alteration in the rules and principles of the law of partnership. The bill had for its object so to relax the rule of law that a participation in profits constituted a partnership as to enable a person to lend to a firm on the condition that the remuneration for the use of the money should be a portion of the profits, instead of a fixed interest. That was the proposal embodied in the first and principal clause. The second clause would enable persons to pay their servants, as a reward for their labour, instead of a fixed salary, a portion of the profits of the business in which they happened to be engaged; while the third clause would entitle the widow or child of a deceased partner in any commercial house to receive a portion of the profits by way of annuity, without thereby being constituted a partner; but it was provided that the lender of the money, the person who received a share of the profits as a reward for his labour, and the annuitant, although they should stand in the relation of creditors to the trader with whom they had had transactions, yet should not be entitled to recover their money until all the other creditors of the firm had been paid. He had adopted in this bill pretty nearly the words which were suggested some years ago by Sir Hugh Cairns. He was not in any way interfering with the general laws of partnership. If a man was put forward to the world as a partner; if he allowed his name to be used as a means of obtaining credit; if he was, in fact, the person who was trusted, then, although he was only a lender, he must be responsible for the debts that were contracted. But if he was a mere lender, if he was not known to the creditor when credit was given to the firm, he did not see upon what principle of justice he could be called upon, should the firm to which he had advanced money fail, to pay all the debts even to his last shilling. He believed that it was doubted by competent authorities, whether the law laid down in the case of Waugh v. Carver, which established that participation in profits constituted a man a partner, was not erroneous. When Mr. Baron Bramwell, then Mr. Bramwell, was examined before the Mercantile Laws Commission, he said, that he should have thought that nothing could have been conceived more contrary to law than the rule which was laid down in that case, but that it had been so long received as law that it could not be changed without legislation. On the grounds of general policy, it was very desirable to enable employers and employed, if they thought proper, to make contracts without any fear under the law of partnership. Too sharp a line was drawn between employers and employed. Strikes and turnouts frequently arose from an exaggerated view of the profits of capital; and the more the system proposed was acted upon, giving the labourer in reward for his labour a portion of the profits, the more likely would correct views on this subject prevail, and the less likely would strikes and turnouts become.

Mr. J. Peel could not assent to the declaration in the preamble, "that it was expedient to alter the law relating to partnership." He believed there was no part of the world in which such great facilities existed for the transaction of commercial affairs as in England, where capital found its way so readily into channels of enterprise, and where credit was so extended, and at the same time founded upon such great security. The present law of partnership was one of the many props upon which our credit system had been erected, and he could not find out that there was any important portion of the commercial community who desired an alteration in that law at present. On the contrary, he had taken great pains to ascertain the opinions of men engaged in commerce—bankers, merchants, and manufacturers, and he found, among all those whose judgment was entitled to respect, the greatest apprehension of the consequences that would ensue from the adoption of the principle of limited liability of private partnership without most ample publicity. He also believed that the present moment was particularly inopportune for any speculations in our commercial equity. It would have been better to have left well enough alone at present. The first clause of the bill contained the substance of the whole. If the House were to adopt that clause, the remainder of the bill must pass as a matter of course. There was a good deal of ambiguity as to the wording of the clause, and "lender" was made use of, instead of the old word "partner." So far as he could understand the clause, its object was to enable two persons to associate together for the purpose of carrying on a trade or calling under a contract, by which one should provide the capital, and another contribute his skill, with his personal attendance to the furtherance of the common object; that each should participate in the profits or losses; and while the working partner should be subject to all the responsibilities of a partner, as, under the present law, the person who furnished the capital should have no further risk than the loss of the capital which he originally put into the concern. There was no provision for any publication or registration, so that, as far as the public were concerned, the contract might be a perfect secret. This would be productive of very evil consequences, and a probable result would be, that cases of this kind would occur:—A scientific person, or a man of mechanical skill, would invent some improvement in the manufacture of a commodity, but not having sufficient capital to carry out his plans, he would invite the co-operation of a man of capital, and make a contract with him to provide money sufficient to carry out the business for a term of years. During that period, supposing the business was eminently successful, the capitalist was never named, but the business was carried on in the name of the inventor, who was the ostensible sole proprietor, who, being so successful, every one was anxious to give him credit, and supply him with the articles which he required; his credit increased, and at the end of the term of the contract the moneyed partner withdrew his capital, and retired. The working partner, very naturally seeing that he could get any amount of credit, thought he could get on without capital, and continued the business as before. The credit was given in the belief that the working partner was in the possession of all the accumulated profits obtained during his successful operations. A slackness might occur in the demand for the article which he manufactured, and he went on for a while with the hope that trade would revive, and he availed himself to the utmost extent of the credit which people were willing to give him. The trade did not mend, and the man was disappointed. He stopped work, and was obliged to call his creditors together, and tell them he was unable to meet his engagements, and the creditors then found for the first time, that, instead of gaining largely from year to year, he had had all this time a vampire on his back in the shape of a moneyed partner, who, after sucking his life's blood, left him a mere skeleton. This was one of the results which was likely not unfrequently to happen under the operation of such a bill as that before the House. It was most probable that the bill would also have the effect of leading to ruinous speculation and overtrading. It was obviously the interest of the moneyed partner in any concern at present to exercise continual supervision over those who had not the same capital as themselves, and to exercise a salutary control over those who might be more energetic and speculative than prudent, and the result was, that, in a very few instances, firms of that kind came into difficulty; but if this bill were passed, the interest of the capitalist would be exactly the reverse, that was, trading to the utmost extent, and to encourage the working partner not only to avail himself of the capital he had advanced, but to stretch his credit to the utmost, and that for the sake of making the annual profits as large as possible. It was quite probable that within a few years of prosperity the capitalist might then take out five or six times as much as he advanced, and if bankruptcy came his loss would be small, while many of the creditors would be involved in a common ruin. This, he believed, would also be a certain result of this bill. It would, in addition, open the door widely to deliberate fraud. He would be sorry to give instances which he might readily adduce, lest if the bill passed they might be adopted as suggestions. In times of panic, which we must expect occasionally, he was afraid that the distress which prevailed on those occasions would be greatly increased by the suspicion that every man would entertain of his neighbour, that he had some unseen partner taking the profits unknown to the public out of the concern. He moved that it be read that day six months.

Mr. J. A. Turner seconded the amendment.

Mr. Scholfield supported the bill.

Mr. Moor suggested that a proviso should be attached to the first clause, to the effect that every contract for a loan of money to a trader, upon a certain rate of interest out of the profits of trade, should be registered.

Mr. Case thought that the uncertainty of limited liability was as nothing compared with the peril and uncertainty of unlimited liability. When they remembered the failure of banks such as Hammereleys, Paul, Strahan, & Co.'s, and a still more recent instance, there could be no doubt that, under no system that could be adopted, could the public be more misled. Those who insisted upon publicity and registration would defeat the object of the bill, and would expose the public to a danger of thinking they had a better security. If there were publication of lenders, the public would associate the credit of the lender with that of the trader, and thus would be liable to be deceived. Surely the public would not be injured, if, when A. or B. became bankrupt, it was found that somebody behind had advanced 6000*l.* or 7000*l.*, which would not come in competition with their debts. He did not agree with the hon. member for Brighton, that the bill would be a dead letter, but he did not think it would be applied in many cases.

Mr. Baxter observed, that many of the objections which had been raised were merely objections that applied to the system of limited liability which had already been settled. As to registration and publicity, those, he thought, were matters for consideration in committee. It was true, that some years ago the majority of the mercantile classes were opposed to the principle of limited liability; but a great change of opinion had since then come over them in that respect.

Mr. Hubbard said it had been stated that that bill was intended to bring together capital and skill, to raise a competition against large corporations and trading companies, and to avert strikes. How it was to avert strikes he could not see, and he could neither admit that a stimulus to competition was required, nor that any fresh means for bringing capital and skill together was necessary. There was a vagueness about the terms employed in the bill. A lender was spoken of. But under that name a man might employ an agent to carry on a concern, and take for himself the lion's share of the profits. If trade went on well, the arrangement might be perfectly satisfactory; but if, instead of there being a profit, there was a loss incurred, how was the capitalist to be satisfied? The very essence of the proposal was, that he was to be a sleeping partner. He looked on the bill as a mischievous, not so much as touching the law of partnership, as touching the law of principal and agent—one of the most important parts of the law connected with commerce, which they ought to be very careful not to impair. The bill would destroy the responsibility of the principal, and substitute for it no countervailing advantage. Under it the capitalist or principal might, the moment an undertaking was going wrong, take all his capital away; and the expectation that the creditors would reap the benefit of his contributions would prove quite illusory. He must deprecate a change which he thought would operate most detrimentally on the character of our commerce. If there was one point on which he felt more confident than on another, it was that those who opposed that measure did so in the interest of the community at large, and of the integrity of our great capitalists. If the bill passed, it would be easy for men of large capital to set up servants and agents, and themselves keep behind a screen, reaping the profit as long as things went on smoothly, but withdrawing their money from the concern before its bankruptcy was declared. He would cordially support the amendment so ably moved by the honourable member for Tamworth.

The Attorney-General said he always listened to receive instruction from gentlemen conversant with the practical operation of the law of partnership; but perhaps those honourable members did not speak with equal authority when they referred to the principles of the law. The effect of the bill, as regarded the law of principal and agent, was quite the reverse of that described by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down. It would repeal the arbitrary law, established by judicial authority alone, which did interfere with the law of principal and agent. The law of principal and agent was, that a man should be held responsible for contracts which he authorised another to make on his behalf, but not otherwise. Then, putting aside the arbitrary decision in the case of Waugh v. Carter, he asked, did the man who lent money to be repaid with interest according to a fluctuating rate, or in proportion to the profits, really authorise the borrower to bind his whole fortune by any contract which he might make? Clearly, nothing could be more foreign from his intention than to give any such authority; and the court of law which said that he should not lend money without being taken to give that authority, interfered with the natural course of mercantile transactions, and virtually prohibited them, by imputing to them a false character and intention. The principle on which the Legislature had hitherto proceeded in altering the law of partnership, and introducing limited liability, had been that of leaving the parties free in mercantile matters to make such contracts as they pleased, and not by arbitrary legal rules to circumscribe the range of legal contracts, which had nothing evil in themselves. As long as a man knew what he was about, let him do that. If A. knew that B. did not undertake to be responsible to him beyond a certain limit, that was his affair; he knew whether or not it was worth his while to deal on that footing. Although many unsuccessful undertakings might be started on the principle of limited liability, yet experience was bringing round the great mercantile concerns of the country to that principle. Why was it not to be extended to other concerns as well? The simple question was, would they allow a man to lend money to a borrower on the terms which they might arrange between themselves? If the law did not interfere, the transaction would not make the lender a partner. Then why should they interfere to make him so? It was said they might mislead those who became creditors of the concern.

To whom did they give credit? They gave credit to the man carrying on the business, and to the business he was carrying on; and the bill did not take away the liability of the person to whom they gave credit. The object of the bill was to prevent the arbitrary interference with the meaning of contracts made by parties. Nothing could be more irrational than the present state of the law, and he did not think that the maintenance of the rule which had been laid down by one of the judges could be said to be necessary for the maintenance of commercial credit.

Mr. Bovill did not think the law so unreasonable as the hon. and learned gentleman had described it, for the principle was perfectly intelligible, that the person who received benefit by a participation in profits should be liable also in case of loss. He was not opposed to limited liability, but the present bill would absolve certain parties from all liability; and it might be intitled a bill to enable capitalists to commit fraud on the public. If the bill should be carried, there was nothing to prevent a capitalist placing 10,000*l.* in the hands of a person of skill and great activity to operate upon. That person might receive a remuneration of 500*l.* a year; but with the capital of 10,000*l.*, credit might be obtained to the amount of 30,000*l.* By regular payments, the credit might be increased in a few years to 50,000*l.* or 60,000*l.* Large profits might be derived, all of which, with the exception of the 500*l.* paid to the agent, would go into the hands of the capitalist; and when a time of reverse came, the capitalist would immediately withdraw his 10,000*l.* The bill, therefore, instead of being a measure limiting liability, would absolve a capitalist so acting from every farthing of liability. The bill struck at the principle of the law of agency, and was not similar to the measures which had been previously sanctioned by the House in two successive years; for the bills of 1862 and 1863 contained various safeguards for the protection of the public which were wanting in the present proposal. In the bills of 1862 and 1863 there were provisions for the public which were omitted from this bill. For instance, there were provisions that there should be a registration, that parties should be bound to contribute the whole sum they had contracted to pay; they were not permitted to withdraw capital, or to take security for it, until the debts were paid; and if any money had been withdrawn, they were bound to restore it for the purpose of meeting debts. It was singular, that while this bill was in the hands of a private member, all these provisions for the protection of the public were contained in it; but when it came into the hands of a public department, the Board of Trade, they were omitted from it.

Mr. Gibson.—This bill has already twice been read a second time.

Mr. Bovill.—That only made the case stronger, for it shewed that the bill must have been a bad one, and must have been, therefore, thrown out. These provisions were actually inserted by a select committee, and had been left out by the right hon. gentleman. He should give his cordial support to the amendment.

The Solicitor-General said, that the preamble of the bill was very simple. It distinguished between lenders and partners. According to the present law, those who lent at a fixed interest were not in any sense partners; but those who lent at not a fixed interest, but at an interest payable out of profits, were not lenders, but partners. The law said that a man was not a partner, even if he received an interest calculated with reference to a proportion of the profits; but if he lent money, and took a share of the profits, then he was a partner. Why should there be that difference? In the case which his learned friend had put, the man who lent 10,000*l.* was not a mere lender; he was actually a partner—one of the firm, and would be responsible for the losses. Therefore, the case had nothing to do with the question. Every single inconvenience which his learned friend had supposed was as applicable to, and was as likely to arise under, the present state of the law as under this bill. The whole subject really lay in a nutshell. The bill would make a great improvement in the present state of the law, and he hoped the House would pass it.

Mr. T. Baring agreed with the Solicitor-General, that the question lay in a nutshell, and the nutshell was this: should a system of trade be established in this country, under which a man should be enabled to get any amount of credit he chose, and should be able to trade to any extent, and, when a time of misfortune came, should be able to withdraw his capital and leave the public to bear the loss? The system of trade hitherto had been to inculcate on our traders that everything depended on their integrity and prudence. A man in trade hesitated now before he rushed into speculation, because he knew that he would risk the whole of his capital and his future prospects; and it was this knowledge that had made the British merchant prudent and calculating. It was true, that you could, not even under a system of unlimited liability, get rid of all frauds, but this was no argument against the adoption of every necessary precaution. Two-thirds of the trade of the country were carried on upon credit, and this rendered necessary all the safeguards which could be provided against plans to deceive the creditor. This measure was without any of the safeguards contained in former measures which had been proposed, and did not give the protection which was afforded to creditors in other countries; it would not clear up the law, but would rather introduce further confusion.

Mr. Goschen said the opponents of the bill wished to prevent the English trading public from doing what they liked with their own. It was poor testimony to the honesty of British capitalists to suppose that there would be a rush of capital in the direction contemplated by the bill, and it would be advanced with a fraudulent tendency.

Mr. Malins denied that the evils contemplated by Mr. Bovill would be brought about by this bill, for they might equally exist if money was advanced for purposes of trade at a fixed rate of interest. Capital and skill ought to participate alike, but there was great difficulty in bringing them together. The bill of the hon. member for Birmingham was one to establish limited liability between ostensible partners; but the case now contemplated was one in which a man was not, in point of fact, a partner, but a lender of money. Could anything be more unreasonable than that if a man lent 500*l.* to a trader, the latter should have authority to spend, to the last farthing, all the money which the lender might possess? It was by no means certain the bill would be very extensively adopted, but that was no reason why the House should refuse to pass it, as it was founded on the soundest principles.

Alderman Rose opposed the bill.

Mr. Newdegate asked for registration of the lenders.

Mr. Henley did not believe that this bill would either make dormant partners or sleeping partners, for it declared that lending money in a particular manner should not in itself create a partnership. The best maxim for the present day was caveat emptor; they must give perfect freedom, and let every one look out for himself. He thought it useless to mince matters, and he believed that to be the plain state of things to which they had come. Whether the safeguards provided by the bill were good or bad might be considered in committee, and he should vote for the second reading.

The House divided. The numbers were—

For the amendment	39
Majority	—87

The bill was then read a second time.

ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.—The Master of the Rolls has appointed Thursday, the 11th May, at the Rolls Court, Chancery-lane, at four o'clock in the afternoon, for swearing in Solicitors. SHIPPING LAW.

In 8vo., price 20s. cloth, lettered.

THE SHIPPING LAW MANUAL: a concise Treatise on the Law governing the Interests of Shipowners, Merchants, Masters, Seamen, and other Persons connected with British Ships. Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1865.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 15, 1865.

UNSATISFACTORY as the law is in most points referring to the practice and procedure of the court of quarter sessions as an appellate court, perhaps no portion of it has been, and (as we think) is in a more lamentable state, than that which, by a misnomer, is supposed to "regulate" the entry and respite of appeals in cases of the removal of paupers. Statutory interferences have not been wanting; but, as is not unfrequently the case, having failed in applying the proper remedy, they have only made the confusion worse confounded. The Court of Queen's Bench has not failed, time after time, to express its dissatisfaction at the manner in which the discretion of the magistrates was exercised; yet having to confess, that it was a matter in the hands of the magistrates, and that they could interfere no further than by an expression of opinion, their words received that amount of weight which too often is awarded to them when referring to matters in the discretion of the great unpaid; the bench listened, perforce, to the words of wisdom, as read to them over and over again by counsel, and went on in their old way. They quietly shewed in a practical way, that knowledge is power, if it is not wisdom; they accepted so much as deferred to their power; rejected so much as reflected on their wisdom. Into the history, however, of the discretions (as by courtesy we must call them) of the magistrates, we do not propose to enter; it is inscrutable. The history of parliamentary interferences, and the result, we, however, propose to give, as lately expressed in the elaborate judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, delivered in the case of Reg. v. The Justices of Sussex (34 L. J., M. C., 69), a case in which, curiously enough, on the quarter sessions taking the opposite course to that which had been generally reprobated, and refusing to enter and respite, the Court of Queen's Bench thought they were wrong under the circumstances; but, on appeal, the refusal was held right. In that case the order of removal was served on the 30th August; copies of the depositions were applied for on the 17th, and received on the 19th September; the quarter sessions for the eastern division were held on the 15th, and for the western (in which the respondent's parish was) on the 18th October, on which day the appellants applied to enter and respite. No grounds had been delivered; by the practice of the sessions, eight days' notice of appeal was required. The sessions refused. On the application for a mandamus to compel them, the majority of the Queen's Bench decided they were wrong, but the Court of Exchequer Chamber has eventually decided they were right; first, because grounds delivered with the notice of appeal would have been valid; secondly, because even if it were necessary to deliver them fourteen days before the sessions, the magistrates have a discretion; and, thirdly, if the above propositions were wrong, yet there might have been a fourteen days' notice to the western division. The history of the law, as given by the Court, and their reasoning on it, in a condensed form, were as follows:—The governing statutes are the 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, giving an appeal to the next sessions; the 9 Geo. 1, c. 7, commanding an adjournment if reasonable notice of trial is not given; the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, delaying the removal of the pauper; and the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 31, leaving the appeal unless within twenty-one days, plus a contingent fourteen days; and the question is, how far the last two statutes affect the first. The first statute was imperfect in not defining "next," and in not regulating the times for the commencing and bringing to trial of the appeal. These imperfections have been partially remedied by the Courts and the Legislature. The Courts held "next" to mean "next practically possible." This relieved the appellants, but not the respondents, and the 9 Geo. 1, c. 7, was therefore passed; but the Courts having decided, that under this statute the appellants, by not giving notice of trial, might demand an adjournment, they could under this statute, intended to relieve respondents, always get a quarter's delay. Some check was put on this by the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, which provided as to the time of the removal of the pauper, and that grounds of appeal should be given with the notice, or fourteen days before the sessions where it was intended to try. The effect of this statute was, that grounds might be delivered with the notice; or if there were more than fourteen days to the sessions, might be delivered as late as fourteen days before the sessions, but the practical time for deciding about appealing was left as under the 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12. Now came the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 31, which, among other things, remedied the evil which arose from the decision, that the removal of the pauper was itself a grievance which could be appealed against. It provided that notice of appeal must be within twenty-one days from service of the order; and if it had stopped there, it would have been complete; but it further provided, that if the appellant required copies of the depositions, he should have fourteen days from their receipt to give notice. Here there was a defect in not limiting the time for requiring them. The statutes thus fix a maximum of delay, after which the appeal is barred, but have no reference to the maximum of delay, after which the sessions next, in fact, may be passed over as not the next practicable, or after which the appellant may demand an adjournment. They give no right to assume that it is not practicable to prepare for trial in the twenty-one and fourteen days; and (as it is clearly possible) the sessions may find that there has been unreasonable delay, and refuse an adjournment. It has been said in some cases that the appellant has a right to take all the time, the twenty-one days plus the fourteen, without losing his appeal. This is true when more than thirty-five days intervene between the service of the order and beginning of the sessions, but not where they begin within that time.

The upshot, then (if we rightly read this decision), is this—that, after all this legislation, neither appellant or respondent can with certainty tell whether they will have to try or not; and whilst they intend, if possible, to put off the trial in order to perfect their case, they will not be able prudently to avoid bringing such witnesses and evidence as they have, for the chance of the Court deciding not to adjourn. This is most lamentable, and we hope that, by a short statute, this matter will be clearly and for ever settled. The scheme, as it appears to us, should be this—First, with the notice of the order of removal should be sent, as now, a copy of the order, and of the grounds relied on; and also, in addition, a copy of the depositions. Secondly, then twenty-one days should be given to examine into the matter, and within them the notice of appeal should, of necessity, be given, together with the grounds. Thirdly, on receipt of the notice and the grounds, the respondent should have an equal time, because in many cases the grounds would contain not mere traverses of their grounds, but assertions of other settlements, into which they should be allowed to inquire; and the rule should be made general to prevent any difficulties arising from distinctions as they have hitherto. Fourthly, if the twenty-one days from the service of the notice and grounds of appeal elapse before the next sessions, both sides absolutely to come and try; if not, then absolutely not to come, but to come and try at the sessions after, unless they agree between themselves to come and try at the previous sessions. Fifthly, to meet cases, where it may chance that the evidence cannot be got in time, where a new settlement turns up, &c., the Court should have power, on being satisfied by evidence on oath that, for the interests of justice, there should be an adjournment to get evidence, set up other grounds, &c., to adjourn the hearing, and add other grounds, on payment of costs of the day, and such other terms as appear reasonable to them. This scheme we submit to such of our readers as are interested in this matter for their consideration. Subject to alterations in detail, it seems to us to meet the necessities of the case.

THE PARTNERSHIP BILL.

WHEN stale fallacies are again brought forward, with a view to action, they must be again refuted. We therefore make no apology for once more explaining and defending in these columns the English law of partnership liability.

Until lately no rule of law was considered to be more firmly settled than that which declares every person who is entitled to a share in the profits of a business liable to pay the business debts. It is true that Lord Eldon once volunteered a statement on the subject which has sorely puzzled the profession; but apart from the dictum in Ex parte Hamper, no rule was better settled or better understood than that which we have stated. Of late no rule has been better abused. Even in a grave treatise on the Law of Partnership it is thus stigmatised:—"The rule is in the highest degree arbitrary; it is grossly unjust; and it is productive of the greatest confusion." (Lindley on Partnership, vol. 1, p. 20). If this be so, and if the English law of contracts is in the main founded on sound principles, the rule must be inconsistent with what is sound in that law; and the mode of amending the law must be obvious and easy. Yet it can be shewn that the rule is nothing but an application to one class of cases of the more general rule, that a debt must be paid by those who contract it, a rule which has hitherto been treated with some respect; while the substitution of a different rule is so far from easy, that during nearly twenty years of agitation no agreement has been concluded, either as to the extent or as to the form of the desired alteration.

It is a principle of English law, that he who procures goods or money to be supplied on credit must satisfy the creditor, although the supply may not be wholly or in part for his own benefit, unless he acts merely as agent for another, and is dealt with on that footing.

Thus, if A. opens a shop, places M. in it as manager, and through M. procures a supply of goods, A. is liable to pay for them, and M. is not liable, unless, by allowing the business to be carried on in his name, or otherwise, he represented himself as a principal. So, if A. and B. carry on the business, either personally or by means of an agent or manager, each is liable for the whole of the debts contracted in it, and not merely in proportion to the amount of his interest; and it is remarkable, that among the suggested alterations, the proposal to excuse a partner from liability for more than a share of the partnership debts, proportionate to his interest in the business, has never been made, or, if made, has never attracted attention.

The creditor, when he seeks to enforce payment of a trade debt, does not sue the shopman, the clerk, or the agent who personally appeared in the business, but he sues the principal, or, at least, the person who held himself out as principal. The principal is the person for whom the business is carried on; and as trade is followed, not as an end, but only as a means of obtaining profit, the person who seeks the profit, who will be entitled to take it if it is made, is the person for whom the business is carried on, and the person who, as principal, is and ought to be liable for the engagements contracted in the conduct of it. If several persons concur in seeking profit from the same business, they are jointly and separately liable for the debts contracted for their benefit. Each is liable for the whole of the debts, because any apportionment of the liability so as to affect creditors, would be inconvenient and unjust; inconvenient as involving creditors in an inquiry into the private concerns of a firm, which they have no means of pursuing; unjust, because it is more reasonable that those who voluntarily join in an undertaking, and have the means of knowing the character and watching the conduct of their associates, should be answerable for each other, than that strangers, who have not the same means of knowledge, and have no power of control, should take the risk. Whatever the inducements may be which determine credit to the firm, they are inducements of which each member seeks to make his profit; and there is no ground of distinction in this respect between a sole trader and a partner. A sole trader, who buys and sells goods on credit, must pay for the goods, although, by the insolvency of his customers, he loses both the cost price and his anticipated profit. It is no answer to the demand to say that he was deceived by those whom he trusted. It is for him to see to and take the risk of his customers' solvency, because he alone can do it, and because without that responsibility he would have no inducement to circumspection and prudence in the conduct of his business. So it is just and wholesome that every partner should be liable, not only for the solvency of his customer, but also for the conduct and solvency of his co-partners, because his judgment alone is consulted in the selection of them, and he alone can reserve and exercise the right of control over the partnership dealings. If he is content to sleep while others work for him, he must also be content to answer for all that he allows to be done on his behalf.

As the law stands, if A. provides the capital, and B. the industry and mercantile skill, which they think necessary for carrying on a business, and agree to divide the profits in any proportion, they are partners, and each is liable for the debts which either contracts in the business. The transaction may be described indifferently as a loan of money by A. to B. in consideration of a share of profits, or as an engagement by B. to conduct the business as the agent for A. in consideration of a share of profits. But by the Government bill, now in the House of Commons, it is proposed to be enacted, that A. or B. shall not be liable on account of any credit given to them in such a business. The proposal is so absurd that we must protect ourselves from the charge of misrepresentation by transcribing the clauses:—

Sect. 1. "The advance of money by way of loan to a person, engaged or about to engage in any trade or business, upon a contract with such person that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or shall receive a share of the profits, or bear a share of the loss, arising from carrying on such trade or undertaking, shall not of itself constitute the lender a partner with the person or the persons carrying on such trade, or render him responsible as such."

Sect. 2 gives priority of claim to other creditors over such lender.

Sect. 3. "No contract for the remuneration of a servant or agent of any person engaged in any trade or undertaking, by a share of the profits of such trade or undertaking, shall of itself render such servant or agent responsible as a partner therein."

A. and B. agree to share the profits of a business. A. furnishes the capital, which is to be repaid to him when the business is wound up. B. manages the concern. A. does not interfere. Who, under the proposed enactments, would be liable for the debts? B. is sued, and replies that he is only the agent. A., on the other hand, says that he is only a lender to B., "engaged in the business." Which is exempt? It would be difficult to maintain the exemption of both—for if B. carries on the business as agent for A., A. must, in effect, carry on the business on his own account by his agent, and so must be liable as principal, though not liable in respect of his participation in profits. But in every case where A. does nothing but lend capital and share in profits, and B. does nothing but manage and take the remainder of the profits, how can the transaction be otherwise described than as a loan and participation of profits within sect. 1, and an agency and participation in profits within sect. 3? Can the substance of the thing be altered, or ought the liabilities of the parties be affected by a verbal or written agreement between them to call A. lender, or to call B. agent? And this is the best substitute that, after so many years of agitation and discussion, can now be offered for the rule that the debtors in a business are those for whose benefit it is carried on!

We have assumed that the bill cannot be read as exempting both A. and B. But if A. and B. desired to become both exempt from liability, they could do so with the help of C., a man of straw. C. would lend his name, but be excluded from interference by very effectual means, not involving any contract to that effect. A. would lend the capital to C. B., as agent for C., and for A.'s protection, would have the custody of the capital and the control of the business. C. would take one ninety-ninth part of the profits, and the residue would be shared by A. and B.

The supporters of the bill ask "Why should one person who finds the capital for another person's business be a partner, if he takes a fluctuating rate of interest, and not a partner if he takes a fixed rate of interest, however high?" The answer is, that it is not another person's business, if the capitalist takes the profits; participation in profits and partnership are two forms of expression for the same idea; that, as we have already explained, a given business is the business of those who are entitled to the profits made in it; and that if a person reserves a right to profits under the name of interest, that might be a reason for making him liable as a partner (as Lord Eldon was disposed to do in Ex parte Langdale, 18 Ves. 300), but could be no reason for exempting other partners. There is an essential distinction between taking interest and sharing profits. The stipulation for profits reasonably and obviously includes a stipulation for inspection of the accounts, and control over the management. A creditor cannot ask for such a control; or if he asks, and gets it, he is a partner in disguise, and evades the law. If that can be prevented, let it be done. The practical reasons for not inferring partnership from a reservation of heavy interest are—first, that it is impossible to fix a standard rate of interest; and, secondly, that the cases in which evasion of partnership liability, by reserving a fixed rate of interest for capital, would be possible, are few and unimportant. On the other hand, the question may be asked, if it is expedient that a man may furnish the capital for a business, or may manage it, and participate with another in the profits, taking, it may be, the principal share, without incurring liability for the debt, why should not a man combine in his own person the character of capitalist and manager, and take all the profits without incurring the liability?

The truth is, that every consideration of expediency justifies the strict enforcement of the old test of liability. You cannot trust a manager with the control of more capital or credit than is due to his own interest in the business without making him reckless; and it is right that, if you do so, you should be responsible for his engagements. On the other hand, if you personally conduct a business, and take a part of the profits, your liability for the losses is the least guarantee that you should give for circumspection in the management. There is certainly nothing in the condition of commerce in this country at the present time which requires that any fresh stimulus should be given to commercial enterprise, or to the employment of capital.

So much importance is still attributed to the remarks which are said to have been made on the subject by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Hamper (17 Ves. 803; S. C., nom. Ex parte Rowlandson, 1 Rose, 89), that it is worth while again to shew, that if what is attributed to his Lordship in that case was really uttered by him, it not only had nothing to do with the case, but was actually contradictory and nonsensical. The question of liability to creditors did not arise, and was not discussed in the case. There was an admitted agreement between two persons to share the profits of an adventure as partners; the partnership and consequent liability of the partners were not denied, and the only question was as to the ownership of certain goods. Lord Eldon, one of whose many foibles was a love of display, which often led him into irrelevant and ill-considered disquisitions, said, "They may clearly agree that all the property which is the subject of that agreement shall be the property of one exclusively, but that the other shall participate in the profit arising from it. The cases have gone further to this nicety, upon a distinction so thin, that I cannot state it as established upon due consideration, that if a trader agrees to pay to another person for his labour in the concern a sum of money, even in proportion to the profits—equal to a certain share—that will not make him a partner; but if he has a specific interest in the profits themselves as profits, he is a partner. Another consideration is, the consequence of that in regard to third persons." This had no connexion with the subject in hand; but it referred to the constitution of partnership as between the parties themselves, and the distinction, stated by Lord Eldon to be thin, is solid and satisfactory. As between themselves, the parties may agree either to be, or not to be partners—that is, to have, or not to have, those mutual rights which belong to that relation. If they agree in so many words, there is no question. If their agreement is silent on the point, the intention must be made out by inference; and it is a fair inference that they intended not to be partners, when they have taken the trouble to stipulate that one of them shall perform certain services, and that his remuneration shall be, not a share of the profits, but a sum fluctuating with profits made by the other. So far as regards the division of the profits only, it is indifferent which way the agreement is expressed (see Katsch v. Schenk, 13 Jur., part 1, p. 668); but as regards the other incidents of a partnership, the relations of the parties will be, as they were intended to be, very different in the two cases. (See Hocker v. Brocklebank, 3 Mac. & G. 250; Harrington v. Churchward, 6 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 576; and Reg. v. Macdonald, 7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1127).

On a subsequent day his Lordship said, "Thomas is clearly a partner as to third persons; whether as between himself and Rogers is a very difficult consideration. The ground as to third persons is this:—It is clearly settled, though I regret it, that if a man stipulates that, as the reward of his labour, he shall have, not a specific interest in the business, but a given sum of money—even in proportion to a given quantum of the profits—that will not make him a partner. But if he agrees for a part of the profits as such, giving him a right to an account, though having no property in the capital, he is to third persons a partner, and in a question with third persons, no stipulation can protect him from loss." Here we have what two days before was stated to be the test of partnership inter se, applied, by way of contrast, as a test of liability to creditors! The dictum does accurately state the test of partnership inter se, though his Lordship, directly contradicting his former remark, said that that was a very different consideration. The dictum appears more inexplicable when the case in which it was uttered is considered. The parties in their correspondence styled themselves partners, and spoke of their "house," and, according to the report in Rose, there was an express agreement to share profit and loss. The dictum was not founded on any previous decision, and has never been acted upon. The assertion that the distinction was clearly settled is one of many instances in which Lord Eldon has endeavoured to justify his doctrine by referring in general terms to purely imaginary authorities. It should be remembered that Lord Eldon's second dictum contained two propositions, one of which is clearly right, while the other is as clearly wrong; and the cases usually cited in connexion with the dictum only bear on the first proposition. Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Bl. 236) decided that an agreement to share profit involves liability to creditors; Grace v. Smith (2 W. Bl. 998), that a fixed annuity to a retired partner does not continue his liability. In Ex parte Langdale (18 Ves. 300) it was alleged that certain brewers stipulated with a publican that they should supply him with beer at 17s. per barrel above the market price, and Lord Eldon directed an issue to ascertain whether this agreement was for an interest in the profits. In Dry v. Boswell (1 Camp.

329) the stipulation was for a half of the gross earnings (which were proportionate to the labour done), and Lord Ellenborough held that to be very different from a participation in profit and loss. This was followed in Pott v. Epton (3 C. B. 32) (where the Court erred in stating that Lord Eldon had acted on his dictum). See also Barry v. Nesham (3 C. B. 641). Dr. Story (who was very inaccurate, and frequently borrowed citations without verifying the references, or acknowledging the source from which he borrowed them) cites in support of Lord Eldon's dictum no less than fifteen cases, in which the only question was as to partnership as between the parties, and five others, in which the existence of a partnership was not in question at all.

The only case in which the rule, recognised and acted upon in Waugh v. Carver, has been materially infringed, is that of Cox v. Hickman (8 H. L. C. 368; 18 C. B. 617; 3 C. B., N. S., 523); where the House of Lords, overruling the decision of the Court below, held that the creditors of an insolvent firm did not, by carrying on the business in the names of trustees for the purpose of liquidating their debts, incur responsibility as partners, but that the trustees who actually conducted the business were the only persons responsible, and were responsible as principals. We have not space for a criticism of the judgments of Lords Cranworth and Wensleydale in that case, and can only observe, that if ever there can be a case in which the persons who ostensibly carry on a business are only agents, and those who participate in the profits are principals, it is when trustees under a deed of arrangement carry on the business of an insolvent for the benefit of his creditors; and that if creditors, who have the right to wound up business, think fit to carry it on for their own benefit, there is no ground of policy or law on which they can found a claim for exemption from liability.

Nothing can more conclusively demonstrate the unsoundness of the proposed alteration of the law of partnership than the pertinacity with which its supporters refuse to consent to a provision for giving notice to the world that a given business is carried on under the protection of the proposed law. Amendments with this view are to be proposed in committee, but we trust that they will be superseded by the rejection of the bill in the other House.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the Superior Courts, the Examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of twenty-six, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

1. Arthur Wightman, who served his clerkship to Messrs. W. & B. Wake, of Sheffield, and Messrs. Patison & Wigg, of London.

2. Leslie Hunter, who served his clerkship to Messrs. J. & J. H. Linklater & Hackwood, of London.

3. Francis Roper Larken, who served his clerkship to Mr. Robert Toynbee, of Lincoln, and Messrs. Scott & Co., of London.

4. Edmund Archibald Stamp, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edmund Stamp, of Honiton, and Messrs. Robinson, Barlow, & Bowling, of London.

To Mr. Wightman, the Prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn.

To Mr. Hunter, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Larken, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Stamp, one of the Prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The Examiners have also certified that the following candidates, under the age of twenty-six, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

John James Amos, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Amos, of Wye, Kent, and Messrs. Eyre & Lawson, of London.

Thomas Bury, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Bennion Acton, of Wrexham, and Messrs. Brooks-bank & Galland, of London.

Watson Robert Jones, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph Bridgman, of Chester.

James Biggs Porter, who served his clerkship to Mr. H. F. T. Miller, of Frome; Mr. William Dunn, of Frome; and Messrs. Whitakers & Woolbert, of London.

Hugh Tilaley, who served his clerkship to Mr. Paul Octavius Haythorne Reed, of Bridgwater.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The Examiners have further announced to the following candidates, that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes or certificates of merit if they had not been above the age of twenty-six:—

1. Charles Leonard Mesnard.
2. Frederick Richard Kilvington.
3. John Paul Poncione, jun.
4. William Smale.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 112; of these 109 were passed, and 3 postponed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, May 4.

RECORD OF TITHE (IRELAND) BILL.

The Lord Chancellor, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that no measure had conferred a greater measure of benefit than the act of 1848. Under it immense sales of encumbered land had taken place to the amount, it was computed, of 23,000,000*l.*; but the act had this effect, that after the incumbered land was sold and a parliamentary title given, the function of the act ceased, and there was no provision for preventing the land falling again into its previous state of embarrassment, by reason of subsequent transactions. This defect was pointed out by the commission of 1857, in whose report it was stated:—

"Great as are the benefits which the Incumbered Estates Court has conferred upon titles in Ireland, it is a remarkable circumstance that there is no provision for perpetuating and continuing as to future transactions the parliamentary title obtained upon a purchase from that Court. The title is unimpeachable as to all transactions prior to the time of purchase, but immediately after the purchase the transfer of the land becomes subject to the general law; and as to all transactions taking place after the purchase, the title is liable to become again involved in complications and embarrassments similar to those from which it was relieved by the sale under the Incumbered Estates Act. Permanent simplification of title and simplicity of transfer are not attained by the act, and retrospective investigation of the title becomes again necessary The system, therefore, which we have recommended is required not less for Ireland than for this portion of the United Kingdom, while at the same time the facilities for its introduction there are much greater than in this country."

Unfortunately, in 1858, when the present Landed Estates

Court was established, though many improvements were introduced, yet the particular improvement referred to was not allowed to find place, and there was no machinery by which the title and subsequent transactions might be recorded and kept in a simple state. The difficulty in this respect was removed in respect to England by the act he introduced in 1862, and the object of the present bill was to adapt to Ireland the machinery and regulations so far as they related to the record of title. Before he proceeded to explain the manner in which this was to be done, it would not be unreasonable for him to refer to the operation of the act of 1862, which was now working in an advantageous manner, and there was every reason to expect that those who availed themselves of it would become more numerous every year. From the 15th October, 1862, to the 1st March, 1864, the date of the last return to the House of Lords, there were 65 applications. These applications comprised about 5000 acres of land, consisting largely of very valuable building land, of an estimated value exceeding 1,500,000*l*. From the 1st March, 1864, to the 30th April, 1865, the applications had been 216, making together 281. The number of acres comprised in the 216 applications exceeded 25,000, and he had no hesitation in saying that the value very considerably exceeded the value of the 65 cases, making the total value exceed three millions. There was no difficulty in working the measure. Their Lordships were aware that there was an association in Dublin, presided over by a noble duke, and intitled the "Registration of Title Association." In an address presented to the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that association stated:—

"We feel that the insecurity, delay, and expense incident to the present system of conveyancing are a hindrance in the transaction of our private affairs, seriously reducing the value of landed property in Ireland, and obstructing the free investment of capital in land and landed securities. We are of opinion that the Landed Estates Court, though affording some alleviation in the case of large estates, fails to provide an effectual remedy for many of the evils complained of. Titles which, at considerable expense and delay, have been cleared of complexities by being passed through that court, are left to be dealt with subsequently under the same system of conveyancing which induced those complexities, and consequently in a short period of time become embarrassed and deteriorated by similar accumulations. We, therefore, think that the Landed Estates Court Act requires to be supplemented by some measure which will enable future dealings with land to be conducted with security, expedition, and economy."

The court had been conducted with so much wisdom, care, and prudence, that there had been hardly a single mistake in its proceedings. The bill enacted, that the conveyance or declaration of title should be entered on a record of title, and that there should be indorsed upon it a minute of every one of the subsequent transactions. In that way the record would become an investment of great value, and the state of the title might be ascertained at any time with the greatest facility. There would be a provision enabling the Court to grant certificates of title, and this power would be extended, so that the Court would give a declaration of title of every description of estate or interest, except in the case of short leases at rack-rents. The great object of the bill would be to enable the Court to receive evidence of ownership, and to declare it judicially, thereby simplifying the title to every description of estate. All transfers must be brought into court, and completed in court, and parties would be released from the obligation of registering deeds of assurance, which at present entailed considerable inconvenience and expense, and at the same time very onerous searches. He anticipated that great advantage would result in Ireland from such a record of title as the bill proposed, and to prove that the system was appreciated, he would only refer to the case of South Australia, where the number of voluntary applications for registering titles had increased from 184 in 1858 to 1138 in 1864. When the mode of dealing with land, which he had described, became generally known, and the advantageous nature of the transactions within the court was contrasted with the transactions which took place outside it, he predicted with the utmost confidence that the increase of business would be probably in a greater ratio than that to which he had already referred. He trusted, then, there would be no objection to the second reading of the bill, but that the measure would be received as the necessary completion of that useful institution—the Landed Estates Court. He begged to move that the bill be now read a second time.

Lord St. Leonards said that the case of Ireland and England, with regard to the transfer of property, was entirely different. In Ireland landed property might be brought into the Landed Estates Court, where it would be sold, and a perfect title given. And besides, there was a General Registration Act, which had long been in operation there, and which had been attended with very beneficial results. But England stood upon very different ground with respect to the sale of landed property, and the creation of an indefeasible title. All that we had here was this—all the charges which were likely to be made, independently of actual execution of deeds, were, under various acts of Parliament, brought into one office; and, therefore, it could be easily ascertained by any person, upon payment of 1*s*., that a title was clear. The difference between England and Ireland which he had pointed out was so great, that what would suit England would not suit Ireland. The nature of this bill was, in a few words, to destroy all conveyancing and dealing with property throughout Ireland, as between owners and ordinary solicitors; it was to put a stop to the whole transfer of property as it was now conducted, in order to take it into a court which had been constituted for other purposes, which had enough to occupy its time, and which would have this additional burthen thrown upon it, and it would thus become the great conveyancing court of Ireland. Nothing could be more injurious to Ireland than that. The bill struck at the root of a useful system, and was open to great objection. No one had worked harder than himself to simplify the transfer of property in Ireland, and no one could feel a greater interest in the subject; but he could not regard the present measure as a wise or well-considered step in that direction.

The Earl of Donoughmore wished to remind his noble and learned friend, that the bill was not a compulsory measure. It had been carefully considered, and was regarded as highly beneficial by the landed interest of Ireland.

The Marquis of Clanricarde said that the Incumbered Estates Act had been of great use in regard to titles; but that in a few years, in consequences of the charges and incumbrances incident to landed estates, matters would fall into confusion without some such measure as the present. He should warmly support the bill, as being calculated to render a great service to the proprietors of land.

After a few words from the Earl of Belmore,
The bill was read a second time.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (IRELAND) BILL.

Earl Belmore moved the second reading of this bill, which had for its object to assimilate the laws of the two countries as to certain points connected with the property of married women.

Lord St. Leonards gave his entire concurrence to the measure; and

The bill was read a second time.

COMMON LAW COURTS (FEES) BILL.

The House went into committee on this bill, and some conversation, conducted in a tone inaudible in the gallery, took place across the table between the Lord Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford. Ultimately the bill passed through committee, and was reported, without amendment, to the House.

Friday, May 5.

The Common Law Courts (Fees) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Monday, May 8.

STRIKES AND LOCK-OUTS.

Lord St. Leonards laid on the table a bill to establish equitable courts of conciliation to settle disputes between masters and men. He had no great hopes that any measure for settling disputes by arbitration would work well in practice. Nobody denied the right of the men to strike. If conducted without intimidation, a strike was perfectly legal. He was satisfied that no attempt could be wisely made to regulate wages by law, and the area over which legislation could operate in this matter was very limited. If anything could be done in that direction at all, it must be by bringing the masters and the operatives into friendly communication, and inducing both to consider together what was for their common benefit. In France, courts of conciliation for dealing with the differences arising between masters and men had existed since 1806. Originally there was a council and also a sub-committee, or bureau de conciliation. Before that sub-committee every single dispute between master and man was taken, and if they could not settle it, the matter was then taken before the council. When the revolution of 1848 broke out, a great change in the system occurred, for then the masters and the men were put upon an equality, and a vast number of operatives being introduced into the council, the scheme failed. Then came the plan now in operation, which placed the matter on a very different footing. The president and vice-president of the court were nominated by the Emperor, and a more restricted qualification was required both from the masters and the men who were to be electors. The masters were required to be patrons, and the workmen to be twenty-five years of age, to have been workmen for five years, and to have resided in a particular district for three years. The qualifications for a seat in the council were thirty years of age, the capacity to read and write, and the qualification of an elector. There was great authority for the establishment of courts of conciliation, for three different select committees had at different periods reported in favour of such a measure. There were enactments in existence which admitted of arbitration between masters and operatives, but very few persons seemed to be aware of them, and they had almost entirely ceased to have operation. The 5 Geo. 4, c. 66, was still law, and under it arbitration might be resorted to on the subjects of dispute between masters and workmen in any trade or manufacture in Great Britain or Ireland: disagreements respecting the price to be paid for work done, or in the course of being done, whether such disputes respected the payment of wages as agreed upon, or the hours of work as agreed upon, &c.; disputes arising out of or touching the particular trade or manufacture, or contracts relative thereto, which could not be otherwise adjusted. But the parties should not establish a rate of wages, at which the workmen should in future be paid, unless with the mutual consent of both master and workmen. The bill which he now intended to lay on the table would enable masters and men, if unanimous, to apply to the Crown for a license, empowering them to establish a court of conciliation. The masters must for six months be traders in the district in which they applied; the workmen must also be resident for six months, and must have worked in their particular trades for seven years. The number of the council was not to consist of less than ten masters and ten workmen and a chairman, and no member of the council was to adjudicate in any case in which he was interested. Powers would be given to them, when a case was submitted to them by both parties, to make an award.

The bill was then read a first time.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

The bill was read a third time. On the question that the bill do pass.

Lord St. Leonards moved the omission of clause 16, allowing the Lord Chancellor to purchase or redeem Chancery compensations with the moneys forming funds belonging to the suitors of the Court of Chancery in addition to the one million of stock previously authorised to be taken from the same funds.

The Lord Chancellor said the fund in Chancery was charged with certain annuities to persons, the greater portion of whom were advanced in years. It was proposed to take from the fund a million of stock, and then the residue, with another fund that was available, could be applied in redeeming the annuities.

The Earl of Derby said the question was, whether under the clause they were not taking more from the Suitors' Fund than the bill professed to do. It was upon that point he should like to have some explanation.

The Lord Chancellor said he would repeat the figures. The Suitors' Fund consisted of 1,991,000*l.* Consols. Besides that, there was a fund of more than 200,000*l.*—he believed it was 240,000*l.*—which had arisen from the surplus fees invested under the direction of the Court. The operation which was proposed was this:—From the 1,991,000*l.* stock a million would be taken, which would leave a surplus of 991,000*l.* Consols. To that surplus would be added the second fund of which he had spoken—say 200,000*l.*, which would make 491,000*l.* Consols. All the money required for the redemption of the compensations and annuities was 4371,000*l.*, and, therefore, the 491,000*l.*, of which he had spoken, would be ample for the purpose. That would discharge every kind of incumbrance affecting the funds, and would leave a million of stock perfectly free.

After a few words from Lord St. Leonards and the Earl of Derby, the amendment was negatived without a division.

Lord St. Leonards next moved the omission of clause 22, which, he stated, proposed to take from the Chancery suitors the value of the master's offices (which were built at the expense of the Suitors' Fund, and were now vested in the Lord Chancellor upon trust to sell and pay the proceeds to the Suitors' Fund), and to pay the money to the Consolidated Fund, so as to form part of the 200,000*l.* which the Government were to pay towards the expenses of the new court.

The Lord Chancellor said that the Government were about to become the purchaser of these master's offices and other offices, every claim being extinguished by the sum of 200,000*l.*, for which the Government proposed to make themselves responsible.

Lord Chelmsford said, that whether the offices were treated as buildings or treated as money, it was plain that they belonged equally to the Suitors' Fee Fund. But the Government proposed to help themselves to these buildings as part of their contribution, ignoring the liability that attached to them. It would, therefore, be unjust to allow the claims to remain in the bill.

The Lord Chancellor said he had explained more than once the course which the Government proposed to take. It would be very much shorter to take the houses than to follow the roundabout process of selling them and paying over the proceeds to the Suitors' Fee Fund, from which a certain amount was then to be withdrawn.

Their Lordships then divided.	The numbers were—

The clause was accordingly struck out.

The bill then passed.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE) BILL.

On the motion that this bill be read a third time,

Lord Redesdale moved an amendment in clause 14, by striking out the words "bridge over or." A bridge over the Strand would at best be a most unsightly object, and an impediment to the traffic of that crowded thoroughfare.

The Lord Chancellor did not admit that such a structure must necessarily be either an ugly object or an obstruction; although it might be so treated as to become both. But the impossibility would hardly warrant them in striking out the words.

Lord Redesdale held it utterly impossible that any bridge could be carried across the Strand without being a disfigurement. No architect would venture to propose such a thing.

The amendment was negatived.

Lord Redesdale moved a new clause after clause 18, in order to enable the public to know what would be the cost of this great speculation, and how the ground was proposed to be occupied. At present they had not the slightest idea of either. He proposed that no notice should be given of the intention to take any property till plans and estimates were prepared of the cost and construction of the buildings, and the sanction of Parliament thereto obtained. His own impression in regard to the site was, that it would not be found very advantageous. There was a very considerable fall from Carey-street to the Strand, and this building would, no doubt, have more fronts than one. It would be utterly impossible that two of them could, from the nature of the ground, have an uniform elevation. He thought it desirable that both Houses of Parliament should be made acquainted with the extent of land required, how the plan was to be carried out, and the cost of the structure, before anything was finally done.

The Lord Chancellor said that it would require the spirit of prophecy to ascertain with certainty what would be the actual expense; but, so far as calculations and estimates of the cost were concerned, they had already been made. He had before stated that an estimate of the value of the buildings on the proposed site had been made several years ago.

That estimate was afterwards carefully revised by a commission, who reported in 1859. Every part of that estimate had again been gone over, and the conclusion arrived at was, that the sum required would be 1,500,000*l*. But they were not without fresh resources. In addition to the Suitsors' Fund, there was a tax to be imposed in the shape of fees, which might be augmented to double the amount.

The Earl of Derby thought the course recommended by the noble Lord, the chairman of committee, was suggested by the most ordinary consideration of prudence in regard to an undertaking of that magnitude. Although there might already have been great delay in connexion with that measure, that was no reason for imprudent haste now. One part of the bill was intended to sanction the appointment of a commission, which should decide on the plan. The estimate for the purchase of the land was 750,000*l*.; but for the buildings to be erected on that land, there was no estimate. The whole thing was an entire guess. Until they determined what the buildings were to be, it was nonsense to talk of an estimate.

The Lord Chancellor explained, that he had said the commission would first have to determine the number of courts and offices required, together with their dimensions.

The Earl of Derby continued.—Inasmuch as it was alleged that all the existing buildings were absolute rubbish, and worthless, he could not understand why the plan might not be prepared, even with the buildings on the ground. He should be astonished if his own architect were to tell him, that his old stables must be pulled down, and his horses turned out, before he could proceed with a plan for building new stables.

Earl Granville said the noble Lord overlooked the fact, that the site of his old stables would be his own land, whereas in the present case the land belonged to other persons.

The Earl of Derby.—But by the bill they made the land their own by taking compulsory powers to buy it, and the only question was as to giving notice to the parties.

Lord Redesdale could not see why it was necessary to have the ground cleared before they laid out the plan. In reference to the necessity of an estimate for a public building of this character, he hoped that their Lordships would recollect what the Houses of Parliament cost, and what it was at first said they would cost. He believed that three times the amount of the original estimate was spent on them. To proceed with a work of the magnitude now proposed without any estimate whatever appeared to be a great act of imprudence.

After some conversation, the words requiring the sanction of Parliament were omitted, and the House then divided on the proposed new clause. The numbers were—

The bill as amended was then passed.

JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

The Marquis of Westmeath, in moving the second reading of this bill, explained that its object was—first, to allow the verdict of three-fourths of a jury to be taken in cases of high treason, murder, petty treason, sedition, or any other felony or misdemeanour; and, secondly, to give to the Attorney-General the power to order a new trial where there had been a disagreement of the jury, and to change the venue in those cases.

Earl Granville thought that their Lordships would hardly be prepared in a thin House to pass a bill introducing such important changes in the law.

Lord Kingsdown approved that part of the bill which proposed to allow a majority of the jury to give a verdict, and he would therefore vote with the noble marquis if he divided the House.

The Earl of Donoughmore could not support the first part of the bill, for altering the jury system, but he thought the second part, providing for a change of venue, well deserved the attention of the Government.

The Lord Chancellor said that the statute under which the venue was changed in the case of Palmer's trial enabled such a change to be made for the purpose of avoiding delay, and he was under the impression that that statute applied to Ireland also. If it were the case that the same power did not exist in Ireland, it would be a very proper subject of consideration whether a measure should not be framed with the object of remedying the defect.

Lord Chalmers did not think that any such power of changing the venue existed in Ireland, and he agreed that it was desirable that the power should be given. It should not, however, be given to the law officers, but to a court of law.

After a few words from Lord Belmore,

The Lord Chancellor said the matter should be taken into consideration.

Upon that assurance of the Lord Chancellor, the bill was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday, May 9.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

Mr. Paull asked the Attorney-General whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government, at the earliest possible period, to submit to Parliament a measure for the amendment and consolidation of the bankruptcy laws; and, if so, whether such measure would provide for the abolition of the power of imprisonment of debtors, to compel the payment of money under any judgment or order of any court, including county courts and other courts for the recovery of small debts.

The Attorney-General said it was undoubtedly the intention of her Majesty's Government at the earliest period at which it was possible to do so, consistently with due attention to the importance of the subject, to submit to the House a measure for the amendment and consolidation of the bankruptcy laws. It was not likely that could take place during the present session. As to county and other courts, the hon. member was aware that the committee had recommended the total abolition of the power of imprisonment for debt. That subject, therefore, would be considered with all the authority the recommendation of the committee could give, but of course it was not in his power to say what the result would be.

In reply to Mr. Heygate,

Mr. Paull said, after the answer of the Attorney-General, he should take steps to withdraw his bill from the orders.

THE REGULATION AND INSPECTION OF COAL MINES.

Mr. Ayrton moved for and obtained a select committee to inquire into the operation of the Act for the Regulation and Inspection of Mines. The inquiry was not to be extended to metaliferous mines.

PRIVATE BILL COSTS BILL.

The Lords' amendments to this bill were considered and agreed to.

Wednesday, May 10.

COUNTY VOTERS REGISTRATION BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this bill, Mr. Hunt moved, "That it be an instruction to the committee, that they have power to extend the provisions of the bill relating to the powers and duties of revising barristers to the case of registration in cities and boroughs." He explained, that it was not his intention to extend the provisions of the bill generally to borough registration. His object was to provide, that the revising barrister should make his order as to costs at the time of hearing; that he should have power to commit for the day for contempt of court; and to make other slight alterations in the existing law.

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into committee on the bill.

Clauses 1 and 2 were agreed to.

On clause 3,

Mr. C. W. Wynn moved as an amendment, the insertion of the following at the beginning of the clause:—"The clerk of the peace of every county shall, on or before the 1st June in each year, transmit to the overseers of every parish or township within such county a sufficient number of copies of the part or parts of the register relating to such parish or township, and the overseers."

The clause as amended was agreed to.

Clause 7 was struck out, an amended clause to be substituted.

Clauses 8 and 9 were agreed to, with verbal amendments.

On clause 10, which provided that the costs allowed on frivolous objections should not exceed 3*l*.,

Mr. C. Wynn moved that the sum be 5*l*.

The committee divided. The numbers were—

For the amendment	111
Against	108

Majority for 5

The clause as amended was agreed to.

On clause 12, giving revising barristers power to commit for contempt of court,

Mr. J. J. Powell objected to the clause as unnecessary.

Mr. Collins was of a different opinion. He knew an instance where the barrister was not only called the foulest names in open court, but had even sticks thrown at him.

The clause was struck out, after some discussion, it being considered that the power proposed to be granted was too large, and that it was unnecessary. Clauses 13 and 14 were also negatived without a division. The remaining clauses of the bill were agreed to.

Mr. Hunt moved a new clause in lieu of clause 7, the object being to enable persons to have their names placed or retained on the list of voters, by making a declaration of their qualification before a magistrate, instead of attending before the barrister.

Mr. J. J. Powell objected to the clause, on the ground that it opened a door to fraud, and moved its rejection.

After some discussion the committee divided, when there were—

For the clause	110
Against	99

Majority 11

The clause was accordingly added to the bill.

Mr. Hunt the proposed a clause prohibiting revising barristers from holding any courts for the revision of the lists of county voters before the 20th September.

The clause was agreed to, and was added to the bill.

Mr. Hunt then moved a clause enabling a revising barrister to have removed from his court any one interrupting the proceedings thereof.

The clause was agreed to, and was added to the bill.

The schedules, with some verbal alterations, were agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the House.

SIR W. HODGES'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.

"The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

COUNCIL OF LAW REPORTING.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, KNT., M. P., Q. C., Chairman.

The object of the Bar Scheme for the amendment of the present system of Law Reporting is the establishment, under professional control, of one set of Reports, to be prepared with skill and accuracy, published with expedition and regularity, and sold at a cost which (excluding all trade profit) shall merely represent the expense of printing, sale, distribution, and management, and the payment of liberal remuneration to the gentlemen employed as editors and reporters.

Such a set of Reports would be worthy of being accepted by the Profession, in all its branches, as the only standard of authority for Case Law. It would guide the Judge in decision, the Advocate in argument, the Text-writer in digesting the law, and the Solicitor in advising his client.

The Council of Law Reporting, appointed in pursuance of the Bar Scheme, have undertaken, and are now engaged in the attempt, to establish such a set of Reports; not by setting up a new set, in rivalry and opposition to the existing sets, but by endeavouring to bring about a fusion of the fifteen existing sets of regular Reports, and, if possible, an amalgamation or discontinuance of one or more of the other sets, upon the basis of a fair regard for existing interests. The success of this attempt will depend entirely upon the extent to which the Council shall receive the co-operation and support of the Profession. The report, too eagerly circulated, that the Common Law Judges either disapprove of, or are opposed to, the scheme, is entirely without foundation. No doubt is entertained but that the regular Reporters would be willing to co-operate with the Council, provided they were satisfied that the proposed Reports would meet with adequate professional support, and the folly of the present system of excessive competition would, it may be expected, lead others interested in the publication of Reports intended for citation as authority to see that the best way of serving their own interests is to serve the interests of the Profession in the manner which the Profession requires.

The Council would remind the Profession that it is proposed to commence the new set of Reports in Michaelmas Term next. The arrangements which will have to be made for that purpose will necessarily require time and much consideration. It is, therefore, most important that those members of the Profession who desire to assist in the proposed effort should do so without delay.

The annual subscription, payable in advance, is as follows:—

For the Appellate Courts ..	2 guineas.
For the Chancery Courts ..	3 guineas.
For the Common Law Courts ..	3 guineas.

or,

For the Entire Series .. 5 guineas.

Names of Subscribers will be received by the Secretary, JAMES THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq., 3, New-square, Lincoln's-inn; of whom Forms of Subscription may be obtained.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 20, 1865.

WE lately took occasion to consider the effect of the Statute of Limitations on the title of the person in possession at the time when the title of the once rightful owner becomes extinguished by adverse possession. (Ante, p. 151). In doing so, we confined our attention to the effect of adverse possession on a legal title. The case of a merely equitable title is different in its essential circumstances from that of a beneficial legal title, and is also governed by different enactments, the operation of which deserves attentive consideration. Mr. Hayes, referring to the statutory limitation of equitable rights, observes that the rule of equity which existed before the statute regarded a mortgagee in possession, for example, as being, in the words of Lord Eldon, quasi a trustee for just nineteen years, three hundred and sixty-four days, and twelve hours, short by five minutes; and that "the equitable limitation by analogy was rendered complete when it was held, not only that an equity might be barred as between mortgagor and mortgagee—as between the legal owner in possession and the equitable claimant—but even that a preferable right to the equity of redemption might be gained by a third person, as against the mortgagee, by length of adverse beneficial enjoyment. Thus, if A. mortgaged to B., and if afterwards, C., a stranger, obtained the beneficial possession, receiving the rents, and dealing with the property as owner, and continued so to enjoy for twenty years, the equity of redemption at the end of that period was virtually transferred from A. to C. This was the point, and the single point, ultimately decided in the great case of The Marquis of Cholmondeley v. Clinton (4 Bligh., P.R., O.S., 1, 38, 99, 105). It was there considered, that as a very large proportion of the property of the kingdom was equitable (the legal estate being vested in mortgagees or trustees in the majority of titles), it would have been a most dangerous doctrine to hold, that enjoyment between mere equitable claimants, the legal estate being outstanding, could never be adverse, and that no length of time could effect a bar, notwithstanding that the person who had been suffered to enjoy owed no duty to the claimant. The result of this state of the law was, that equitable possession, if it may be so termed, was capable of ripening into a good title at an earlier period than legal possession; and that the mere accident of the legal estate being outstanding, might render the adverse enjoyment effectual, where, if the title had been purely legal, the claimant would not have been barred. But the new statute, by not only providing an express bar to equitable claimants (ss. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28), but also subjecting legal and equitable remedies to corresponding restrictions, has established uniformity as to both the positive force of the bar and the period of limitation. This assimilation could not have been effected without the abolition or the limitation of real actions which were maintainable after the remedy by eject-ment was lost. There was obviously, however, considerable difficulty before the new statute in extending the principle of legal limitation to cases like that of The Marquis of Cholmondeley v. Clinton; and the final decision, however authoritative, may be thought to stand more upon convenience than principle. It involved an obvious anomaly. Where there was wrongful possession at law of a certain duration the remedy was barred, but the right was not transferred. And the wrongdoer's title, which began with the wrong, became established only because he was in possession, and could no longer be evicted; but, in the case of the mere equity, the adverse claimant had not a shadow of title till the clock had actually announced the expiration of the twenty years, when the equity at once vested in him. The most cursory reference to the nature and course of an adverse legal title will shew how entirely the analogy failed. Even the new law is not free, perhaps, from the difficulty of shifting the equity, or rather of recreating in A. the equity which it extinguishes in B. In order to complete the assimilation to legal titles, we are obliged to consider the adverse equitable claimant as constructively in possession, and as left, by the extinction of the very equity, in the unimpeachable possession; but in this there is now less incongruity, since, even in regard to the legal title, the statute admits of constructive dispossession* (sect. 2)."

It is submitted that the supposed rule, which would involve the incongruity here pointed out, did not exist under the old law, and has not been introduced by the act of Will. 4. The case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton, and the alterations introduced by the 24th and 25th sections of the Statute of Limitations, deserve a more attentive consideration. In that case, lands were devised by Samuel Rolle to trustees for 200 years, in trust to raise a portion, and subject to the term, to the testator's only child, Margaret, for her life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail. Margaret Rolle had only one son, George, Earl of Orford, who in 1781, after his mother's death, suffered a recovery, and limited the land to the use of himself for his life, with remainder to the use of the heirs of his body, with remainder to such uses as he should appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of the right heir of Samuel Rolle; and he reserved a general power to revoke the uses. In 1724 the term was assigned to a mortgagee, who advanced the portion, and in 1785 the mortgage debt was transferred to Sir Edward Hughes, to whom George, Earl of Orford, appointed the fee as a further security, the term being assigned to a trustee. In 1791 George, Earl of Orford, died without issue, upon which it was considered that the estate descended to Lord Clinton, who was the heir of Samuel Rolle, and not to the heir (ex parte paternâ) of George, Earl of Orford; and Lord Clinton, with the consent of all parties, accordingly took possession of the estates, and settled and mortgaged them. A doubt having arisen whether the appointment of 1785 did not absolutely defeat the ultimate limitation in the recovery deed of 1781 in equity as well as at law, Horace, Earl of Orford, who was the heir of Earl George, executed in 1794 a deed, by which, reciting that doubt, he granted, released, and confirmed the estate to the trustees of Lord Clinton's settlement, in the same manner as if the appointment of 1785 had not been made. In 1812, twenty-one years after the death of Earl George, the heir and the devisee of Earl Horace filed their bill against the mortgagees of 1785 (to whom interest had been regularly paid by Lord Clinton), Lord Clinton, and his trustees and mortgagee, offering to redeem the mortgage of 1785, and insisting that, under the limitation in the recovery deed, Earl George took an estate by purchase in fee, descendible to his heirs ex parte patris, and that the deed of confirmation could not operate beyond its declared object, which was merely to remove the doubt created by the appointment of 1785. Sir W. Grant, M. R., declared his opinion on the questions of construction to be in favour of the plaintiffs, and said that their claim was not barred by lapse of time, for the enjoyment by Lord Clinton had not been in the character of owner of the legal estate, nor under any claim of being so entitled. It was, therefore, not adverse to the mortgagee, who held the estate in trust for the true owner of the equity of redemption, and there could be no disseisin of an equitable estate. (2 Meriv. 171). The cestui que trust could only be barred by barring and excluding the estate of the trustee. A case having been sent to the Queen's Bench on the effect of the limitation in the recovery deed, Sir T. Plumer, at the hearing on the equity reserved, decided against the plaintiffs, both on the question of construction and on that of the effect of adverse enjoyment. (2 J. & W. 1). Upon the appeal to the House of Lords, the discussion was confined to the equitable questions in the case, and the bill was dismissed on the advice of Lords Eldon and Redesdale, that, by analogy to the Statute of Limitations, the adverse possession of an equity of redemption for twenty years is a bar to any other person claiming that equity of redemption.

In Cholmondeley v. Clinton the title of the mortgagee had not been barred, and the decision would have been the same if the legal estate had been vested in a trustee upon an express trust; for though, as between the trustee and the cestui que trust, implied and express trusts may stand upon different footings, in a case between two adverse claimants of an equitable interest, to be decided on the analogy of the rule at law, the form of the origin or evidence of the equity cannot be material. (See 4 Bligh, O. S., 35, 116). In the case under consideration, Lord Eldon said, "If A. B. is trustee for C. D., and C. D. mortgages to E. F., and E. F. holds for more than twenty years without admission, would equity permit C. D. to come to redeem after twenty years? To redeem either E. F. or A. B.? Does not A. B. after twenty years become trustee for E. F.?" (Id. 38). Under the circumstances above detailed, the mortgagee would not have been barred if the stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, and 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 28, had been in operation; for the payment of interest by a person in possession claiming to be owner of the equity of redemption, is not the less equivalent to an acknowledgment of the mortgagee's title, because it happens to be made by one who is not the true owner of the equity^o. So, if a trustee lets a stranger into possession under the belief that he has an equitable title to the possession, a tenancy at will must be implied.

If the statute of Will. 4 had been in force when the case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton arose, the decision would have been the same, for the equity of redemption, being an implied trust, would have come within the general enactment of the 26th section, which subjects equitable claims to the same rules as claims at law. But in Cholmondeley v. Clinton the mortgagee was defendant, and it was not decided, that because the true owner of the equity of redemption was barred of his remedy against the mortgagee, therefore the party whose wrongful possession had created that bar was thereby put in the place of the late equitable owner, so as to be entitled to maintain a redemption suit against the mortgagee (whose title was not barred). That case by no means warrants the conclusion that has been drawn from it, nor does there seem to be any authority (beyond the remark by Lord Eldon, cited above) for saying that, either under the old law or under the statute, wrongful enjoyment of an equity, not amounting to a bar of the legal estate of the trustee, is a bar of the true owner's equitable title for the benefit of any one but the trustee himself. Analogy is entirely against the proposition, that adverse enjoyment of an equity for twenty years operates as a virtual transfer of the equity to the person who has enjoyed it; it operates, on the contrary, it is submitted, as an extinction of the equity for the benefit of the person who may be able to establish his right at law[†]. It is true, that under circumstances similar to those in Cholmondeley v. Clinton, the mortgagee's case in an action of ejectment, and his defence to a suit for redemption, would not be consistent, for in order to shew that his legal title was not barred by adverse possession, he must shew acceptance of interest within twenty years from the person in possession as owner of the equity of redemption, while, in answer to a suit by that person for redemption, he must insist that he never had a title to the equity of redemption. But this is a difficulty peculiar to the case of mortgagor and mortgagee, and does not affect the general question under consideration. Where the equitable interest which is barred is less than an interest in fee-simple, a claim may plausibly be made by those entitled in remainder or reversion, on the ground that their interests have been accelerated in enjoyment by the destruction of the prior interest.

The doctrine in Cholmondeley v. Clinton was founded ^o See Chinnery v. Evans (10 Jur., N. S., 855) and Ames v. Mannering (26 Beav. 583).

[†] See Sand's case (8ld. 408) and Burgess v. Wheate (1 Eden, 177). But see Downe v. Morris (3 Hare, 394) and Young v. Waterpark (13 Sim. 204; 15 L. J., Ch., 63).

* But this was not decided.

on reasoning which was applicable to express trusts as much as to equities of redemption. But the act of Will. 4 has made a great alteration in respect of the former, and does not allow any adverse possession which is not a bar to the trustee to bar the cestui que trust under an express trust, except only the adverse possession of a purchaser for value from the trustee, and then the bar is confined to claims against the purchaser and those claiming under him*. As between the cestui que trust and the trustee, or mere volunteers in adverse enjoyment, there is no definite and inflexible bar, though equity may still refuse to interfere on any special grounds of acquiescence, delay, or otherwise, in individual cases. But an express equity may of course be barred with the legal estate which supports it, by possession adverse to the trustee as well as to the cestui que trust. (Burroughs v. McCreight, 1 Jo. & Lat. 290; 2 Jo. & Lat. 198; Melling v. Leak, 16 C. B. 652).

In Cholmondeley v. Clinton the judges professed to be guided by analogy to the rule of law; but under the statute courts of equity are no longer at liberty to follow the rules which govern the limitation of legal rights, but are bound by rules expressly framed for the regulation of equitable claims, and differing in cases of express trust from those applicable to legal rights. Relief may, indeed, under the 27th section, be refused to persons who are not barred by the express provisions of the act; but this can only be done on purely equitable grounds of acquiescence, delay, or otherwise, and not on the analogy of a legal rule. (See the distinction pointed out by Lord Cottenham in Leeds v. Amherst, 2 Phill. 123). In Knight v. Bowyer (2 De G. & J. 443), Lord Justice Turner said that the rules on this subject which apply to ordinary cases, if they apply at all, do not apply with equal force to cases of express trust. In the case of Malone v. O'Connor (9 Ir. Eq. Rep. 459) lapse of time was held to be a bar to a claim to an equity under circumstances (too complicated to be here stated) which seem to have been within neither the provisions of the Statute of Limitations, nor any rule of equity against stale demands.

There are, however, many subjects of equitable relief not within the 24th section (which is confined to suits to recover "land" or "rent," as defined in the 1st section, and does not extend to claims for compensation for breaches of trust, waste, recovery of title-deeds, &c.) in the limitation of claims to which courts of equity are still guided by analogy only. Thus, it has been held, that a tenant in tail in remainder is not bound to interfere to prevent equitable waste or to secure compensation for it, during the life of the tenant for life, as he cannot be sure that he will, by surviving the tenant for life, become entitled to the compensation. (Leeds v. Amherst, 2 Phill. 117). See Egg v. Devey (10 Beav. 447) and Re Ashwell (1 Johns. 112). As to suits for the recovery of deeds, see Wills v. Doddington (2 Coll. 73).

* "It is not very reasonable to suppose that the remedy was intended to be preserved against the trustee, but destroyed against the persons who had received the benefit of the breach of trust." (Knight v. Bowyer, 2 De G. & J. 431).

UNION CHARGEABILITY.

THE following sound and judicious observations on Union Chargeability, by Mr. Serjeant Manning, appeared in "The Athenæum" for May 6:—

A bill has been introduced into the House of Commons, "To provide for the better Distribution of the Relief of the Poor in Unions." This bill was stated to be founded upon a resolution of a committee of the House of Commons, "That any measure for extending the area should embrace provisions for making the whole cost for the poor in each union chargeable on the common fund of the union."

In the debate which took place, on the 28th March, upon the motion for the second reading of this bill, it appears to have been assumed that the proposition contained in the resolution was, in substance, "That any measure for making the whole cost for the poor in each union chargeable upon the common fund of the union, should contain provisions for extending the area of rating." In the present article an attempt will be made to shew that a great and, at the same time, a gratuitous injustice would often result from adopting such an inversion of the precise terms of the resolution.

The inverted proposition seems to assume that union chargeability requires an absolute equality of union rating. The consequence of that assumption has been, that those who were strongly impressed with the important benefits which the labouring classes would evidently derive from a non-discriminating union chargeability without distinctions connected with parochial settlement, have regarded those benefits as cheaply purchased by a shifting of burthen which would follow the establishment for all the purposes of a uniform union rating. On the other hand, persons keenly alive to the hardship occasionally inseparable from a change in the incidence of taxation, which would be caused by the introduction of an invariable uniform union rating, have not unnaturally been led to undervalue the benefits to be derived from the establishment of union chargeability.

Let there be two farms in the parishes A. and B., belonging to the same union, the productive value of each farm, after deducting general union rates and other outgoings common to both, being 100*l.* a year; but where the average parochial rates during the four years which have followed the first establishment of a union rating under the Irremovable Poor Act, have been, upon an average, 2*s.* in the pound in A., and 6*s.* in the pound in B. The purchaser of the farm in A. would deduct 10*l.* from the 100*l.*, reducing the clear annual value to 90*l.*, and, at thirty years' purchase, he would give 2700*l.* for the fee-simple, whilst the purchaser of the farm in B. would deduct 30*l.*, and would estimate the value of the fee-simple at 2100*l.* If these two assessments of 2*s.* and 6*s.* were transformed and amalgamated into one union rating of 4*s.* in the pound, the net yearly value of each farm would be 80*l.*, and the fee-simple value of one farm would rise from 2100*l.* to 2400*l.*, whilst that of the other would fall from 2700*l.* to 2400*l.* It would be no answer to say, even if the statement were capable of proof, that the difference in the poor rates of the two parishes had been occasioned by the destructive policy of some former proprietors in A., or by the operations of speculating builders in B.

I venture to suggest, that the whole difficulty might be obviated by enacting that the parishes A. and B. should henceforth pay rates equal to the average of the payments made by them respectively during the last four years—that is, since the Irremovable Poor Act came into operation. Should the amounts so contributed be insufficient to meet the future expenditure of the union, the excess might be charged upon the entire union fund, such charge to be met by an entire rate; and if any surplus resulted from a diminution of the charges upon the new union fund so constituted, such surplus might be applied in reduction of the entire union rate. In either case the desired result would be obtained, and settlement in one parish rather than in another parish within the same union, would become matter of perfect indifference as well to the pauper as to the ratepayers.

Neither this suggestion, nor the provisions of Mr. Villiers's bill, as it now stands, would, it is true, meet the constantly recurring complaints of the inequality of the burthen upon rich and poor parishes. These complaints usually have arisen from confounding the hand by which the rate is paid, with the pocket out of which the amount ultimately comes. If it be worth A.'s while to pay 40*l.* a year for the occupation of a house and shop in Bethnal Green, it is of little consequence that 5*l.* goes to the landlord, and 35*l.* to the support of the poor, whilst B., in the parish of St. James's, pays 35*l.* to the landlord, and 5*l.* to the overseer. Yet it is held up as an intolerable grievance and a flagrant injustice, that in Bethnal Green A. should be summoned and distrained upon for 35*l.*, whilst in St. James's B. can make his peace with the grim official by the payment of 5*l.* only. If the landlord, who in effect pays the heavy poor rate, is aggrieved, it can only be because the burthen has been imposed since he acquired the property. Nor can the tenant reasonably complain, except in cases where the rate has been increased during his occupation, and where that occupation has been under a rent permanently fixed, and where, therefore, he is owner pro tanto. Justice, however, or at least expediency, seems to require that some measure should be adopted, perhaps upon the principle of the above suggestion, with the view of preventing a further divergence in the rates of different parishes.

The stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2, provided for the creation of a fund, by an assessment upon real and personal estate, for the relief of the impotent poor, irrespective of any connexion with the parish in which the persons to be relieved were born, or in which they had resided or had worked. The statute imposed the burthen of relief upon the real and also upon the personal property of the inhabitants. But in the reign of Elizabeth the value of personal property was small in comparison with that of the realty, and the small personal property being chiefly in the hands of the officials, on whom devolved the power of apportioning the burthen, namely, the churchwardens and overseers, personal property was omitted from the rate, and thus wholly escaped taxation. The pretext for this omission was the supposed difficulty of ascertaining the value of personal property—a difficulty which Chancellors of the Exchequer have not been deterred from grappling with, in the matter of income-tax. The vast accession to the numbers of the pauper class, resulting from, or which at least have followed, the increase of trade and manufactures and their fluctuations, had not yet begun to be felt.

Under one of the reactionary statutes enacted shortly after the Restoration (13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12), indigent persons, though still entitled to present relief in the parish in which they became destitute, were made liable to be removed to the parish in which they were deemed to have acquired a settlement by birth or by their own act. The amount of litigation at quarter sessions and in the Court of King's Bench, arising upon the statute, was enormous, and the decisions in settlement cases called forth special books of reports. One of these cases has been so ably condensed, that it may fairly be said to rival in brevity the reports in the Year Books. An Englishwoman married a foreigner who had not acquired a settlement, and therefore, although entitled to relief in case of destitution, under the statute of Elizabeth, he was not removable under the statute of Charles. As husband and wife could not be legally separated, both were entitled to continuing relief in any parish in which they might happen to be found in a state of destitution. The husband died, and a question arose in the Court of King's Bench; then presided over by Sir John Pratt, the ancestor of the Marquess Camden, as to the place of settlement of the widow. The case has been thus reported:—

A woman having a settlement,
Marries a man with none;
Quere, whether the settlement,
He being dead, is gone.
Quoth Sir John Pratt, the settlement
Suspended doth remain,
Living the husband, but him dead,
It doth revive again.

Chorus of Poise Judges.

Living the husband, but him dead,
It doth revive again.

The power of removal created by the statute of Charles, is confessedly the cause of the most severe evils which press both upon the actually and the proximately pauper population, whether those evils present themselves in the shape of actual removal, or in the more insidious as well as the more pernicious form of destruction of cottages, or otherwise. Intra-union removal will be suppressed by the operation of Mr. Villiers's bill as completely, whether a change in the incidence of taxation, apparently as unnecessary as it has been felt to be unjust, is retained or abandoned.

THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Protest on the Third Reading of the Courts of Justice Concentration Bill.

Clause 14. Moved to omit the words "bridges over or." Resolved in the negative.

Dissentient—

1. Because these words are introduced for the purpose of sanctioning the erection of a bridge across the Strand, to remedy the inconvenience (inseparable from the proposed site) arising from one of the most crowded thoroughfares in the metropolis being between the Temple and the new courts:

2. Because such a bridge in connexion with the new buildings must be a most unsightly object, if carried across the street in one span, and hardly less so if in any other manner; and will, in the latter case, perpetuate, and perhaps add to, the present Temple-bar obstruction, and the demand for which is as discreditable to the taste of the Templars, who have asked for it, as it will be to that of any authority which may hereafter permit it to be erected.

REDESDALE.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—A meeting of this society took place at its rooms, 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, on Wednesday, the 10th instant, W. M. Best, Esq., in the chair; when a paper was read by Mr. C. C. Massey, "On the Exclusion from Evidence before Verdict in Criminal Prosecutions of the Fact of previous Conviction." A discussion ensued, in which the chairman, Sir Patrick McColquhoun, Mr. Worsley, Mr. C. Hopwood, and Mr. C. Clark took part.

BILL IN PROGRESS.

A Bill to establish Equitable Councils of Conciliation to adjust Differences between Masters and Operatives.

(LORD ST. LEONARDS).

Recites the 5 Geo. 4, c. 96, intituled "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relative to Arbitration of Disputes between Masters and Workmen;" the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 67; and the 8 & 9 Vict. cc. 77 and 128.

SECT. 1. If any number of masters and workmen, in any particular trade or trades, occupation, or employment, being inhabitant householders or part occupiers of any house, warehouse, counting-house, or other property, within any city, borough, town, stewartry, riding, division, barony, liberty, or other place, and who being a master in such trade shall have resided and carried on the same within any such place for six calendar months previous to the signing of such petition, and being a workman shall have resided for a like period within any such place, and shall have worked at his trade or calling for seven years previous to the signing of such petition, shall at a meeting specially convened for that purpose, agree to form a council of conciliation and arbitration, and shall jointly petition her Majesty to grant them a license to form such council, to hold, have, and exercise all the powers granted to arbitrators and referees under the before-recited acts, and in such petition for the same shall set forth the number of the council, and also the names, occupation, and residence of the petitioners, and the manner in which the expenses of the said council and of the registry hereinafter directed are to be provided for, it shall then be lawful for her Majesty, or her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, to grant such license, provided notice of such petition has been published one month before the application for such license in the London Gazette, and in one or more of the local newspapers of the place whence such petition emanates; provided always, that it shall be lawful for any masters and workmen in any particular trade or trades, occupation, or employment as aforesaid, within the limits of the application of the Metropolitan Local Management Act, or within any two or more boroughs or districts of the metropolis, to associate themselves for the purposes of this act, and with such license as aforesaid to form councils as aforesaid, as if they resided within any one borough or district.

2. The said council shall consist of not less than two masters and two workmen, nor more than ten masters and ten workmen, and a chairman; the number to constitute the said council to be inserted in the license; but no member of the council shall adjudicate in any case in which he or any relation of his is plaintiff or defendant.

3. For the purposes of this act, the persons whose names, occupations, and abodes are attached to the petition praying for a license shall and they are hereby authorised to proceed to the appointment of a council of conciliation and arbitration from among themselves, within thirty days after such grant of license; and the said council shall remain in office until the appointment of a new council in its stead.

4. The council shall have power to appoint their own chairman, clerk, or such other officer or officers as they may deem requisite, and shall have power to hear and determine all questions of dispute and difference between masters and workmen, as set forth in stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 96, which may be submitted to them by both parties, and shall have, hold, and exercise all the powers and authority granted to arbitrators and referees by and under the various enactments and provisions of the acts before recited; and any award the said equitable councils of conciliation and arbitration may make in any case of dispute or difference submitted to them under the before-recited act or acts, or under this act, shall be final and conclusive between the parties to such arbitration, without being subject to review and challenge by any court or authority whatsoever; and the said council are hereby further authorised to adjudicate upon and determine any other case of dispute or difference submitted to them by the mutual consent of master and workman, or masters and workmen, and the same proceedings of distress, sale, and imprisonment as are provided by the said recited acts, or any of them, shall be had towards enforcing every such award (by application to any justice of the peace of the county, stewardry, riding, division, barony, city, town, burgh, or place within which the parties shall reside), as are by the said recited acts, or any of them, prescribed for enforcing awards made under or by virtue of the provisions of them, or any of them; but nothing in this act contained shall authorise the said council to establish a rate of wages, or price of labour or workmanship, at which the workman shall in future be paid.

5. That a quorum of not less than three (one being a master and another a workman, and the third the chairman) may constitute a council for the hearing and adjudication of cases of dispute, and may accordingly make their award; but a committee of council, to be denominated the committee of conciliation, shall be appointed by the council, consisting of one master and one workman, who shall sit at such times as shall be appointed, and be renewed from time to time as occasion shall require; and all cases or questions of dispute which shall be submitted to the council by both parties shall in the first instance be referred to the said committee of conciliation, who shall endeavour to reconcile the parties in difference; when such reconciliation shall not be effected, the matter in dispute shall be remitted to the council to be disposed of as a contested matter in the regular course.

6. The chairman of the council, who shall be some person unconnected with trade, shall preside at their meetings, and shall be appointed at their first meeting after obtaining such license as aforesaid; when the votes of the council shall be equal, the chairman for the time being is to have the casting vote.

7. No counsel, solicitors, or attorneys to be allowed to attend on any hearing before the council or the committee of Conciliation.

8. Council to be elected for one year. Case of vacancy, &c.

9. Qualification of voters for council.

10. Register of voters.

11. Meetings of masters and workmen to elect the council.

12. Voting papers.

13. Election.

14. Appointment of clerk.

15. Place of meeting.

16. To make list of fees, by-laws, &c.

17. Recited acts to remain in force. Act not to extend to domestic servants or servants in husbandry.

18. Short title.

19. Commencement of act.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, May 11.

The Earl of Belmore presented a bill to provide for the registration of railway debentures and debenture stock, which was read a first time.

RECORD OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the House went into committee on this bill, and the various clauses were agreed to, with amendments.

THE COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION BILL.

On the motion that this bill be read a third time, Lord St. Leonards referred to the County Courts Bill of last session, which, he said, among other provisions, proposed to give an equitable jurisdiction to county courts, but which, after much discussion, the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack thought right not to proceed with. If that bill had not been abandoned, some settlement might have been come to, in reference to the provisions in it relating to the credit given to wives and daughters by packmen, and to the frequent commitments and recommitments for the same trifling debt. The original object of the establishment of county courts was to provide an easy mode of recovering small debts and demands; but since their first establishment bankruptcy business had been added to the labours and duties of the judges. At the present moment, so far as legal power was concerned, they were prohibited from entertaining any question with respect to title, or the construction of settlements and wills. The bill now before their Lordships proposed to give them equitable jurisdiction up to a certain value; but he ventured to say, that in many cases where the amount involved was not considerable, questions were raised as important in point of law as could possibly occur in any suits brought before their Lordships' House. The ground on which the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack introduced the bill was, that the costs in courts of equity in cases of small amount swallowed up the property in dispute; but it was not so much the strict costs of the suit which occasioned the great expense, but the costs resulting from the discussion of extraneous questions, which ought never to have been entered upon. The county court judges were a learned body of men, but it was no impeachment of their ability to say, that they were not competent to discharge the new functions which the bill would throw upon them. They had never practised in equity, and they would be naturally unable to exercise this equitable jurisdiction with benefit to the suitors. All sorts of powers were given to the judges, and from their decisions an appeal was to be allowed to the Court of Chancery. Thus, the unhappy suitor would be compelled to begin again in the court from which he had been ousted, and, for the purposes of appeal, would have to incur all the expenses of the old procedure. But his great objection to the bill was the enormous encouragement it would give to litigation. You ought not to go round the country with perambulating courts of equity, urging people to litigate, promising them facilities for so doing, and inducing them to resort to equity for all sorts of disputes, which otherwise, in all probability, would be amicably settled. People were generally quite ready enough to go to law at present; and this bill would give them the means of enforcing every fancied right in cases, nine out of ten of which would, but for the bill, be settled without resorting to the law at all.

The Lord Chancellor regretted that his noble and learned friend had not given credit to their Lordships for recollecting what he had said upon two former occasions. What they had the pleasure of hearing from him now they had heard at some length, both on the second reading and also in the committee of the bill. He regretted that his noble and learned friend had thought proper to call in question the competence and knowledge of the judges of the county courts. He could assure his noble and learned friend that he had been quite misinformed upon that point. He could pledge himself to their Lordships that the county court judges were a body of men who would bring to the administration of justice under the bill a large amount of knowledge, as well as great industry and care, in the execution of their new jurisdiction. That the new jurisdiction was required was pretty generally admitted, and he should be most happy, provided the bill passed, if this session were to be productive of no other amendment of the law. Under the law as it now stood there was an absolute denial of justice to the poorer classes, because the Legislature had made no adequate provision for their case. He hoped their Lordships would unanimously pass the bill.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Friday, May 12.

THE REV. MR. WAGNER.

The Marquis of Westmeath inquired if the public reports of proceedings in the magistrates' court at Trowbridge, held on Thursday, the 4th May, were authentic. The reports stated that the Rev. A. D. Wagner, described as perpetual curate of St. Paul's, Brighton, was a witness before that court when a prisoner was under examination on a charge of murder, and that to a question made by the court, with six magistrates present, the said A. D. Wagner declined answering a question pertinent to the case, alleging that what he knew was under the seal of confession. He asked whether the magistrates should not have thereupon committed him. The noble marquis quoted several authorities, in order to shew that the law of England did not confer upon a clergyman the privilege of refusing to divulge secrets which had been confided to him in the confessional. More than one case had in fact occurred, in which Roman Catholic priests had been committed to prison for refusing to answer questions as to the confessions of prisoners; and on the last occasion when that occurred, the late Sir George Lewis and the then Attorney-General had declared, in the most explicit terms, in answer to Sir G. Bowyer, that the Roman Catholic clergymen had no privilege to refuse to answer questions relating to matters confided to them in confession.

The Lord Chancellor could not reply to the first question, because he had not much time to read the newspapers*. As to the last question, he must congratulate the noble marquis on the industry with which he had obtained a clear understanding of the law on this point. The materials he had at his command really rendered it a matter of supererogation for the noble marquis to put a question to the Lord Chancellor. He had stated the law as clearly as the Lord Chancellor could have done, and with a much greater profusion of authorities than the Lord Chancellor had at his command. There could be no doubt that no clergyman was privileged to refuse to answer a question put to him as a witness in the course of a criminal trial, on the ground that such answer would reveal something that he had learnt by confession. He might be compelled to answer. The law of England did not even allow this privilege to a Roman Catholic clergyman in dealing with a member of his own profession. No doubt, therefore, Mr. Wagner was under an obligation to answer the question if it had been insisted upon. But it was a matter of discretion whether this should be done. In this case the magistrates had enough evidence without Mr. Wagner answering the question, and therefore they did not press it, or visit him with those consequences with which he might have been visited. The prisoner was committed for trial, and therefore he did not think that it was at present necessary to take any further notice of the case.

Lord Chelmsford said, that as Mr. Wagner had attended reluctantly before the magistrates, they had no power to commit him for refusing to answer. That power was only given, under the Criminal Justice Act, in case a witness was brought before a magistrate on a summons or by warrant.

The Lord Chancellor remarked, that if the reports in the newspapers were correct, Mr. Wagner said that he had received a subpoena, and appeared under compulsion.

After a few words from Lord Harrouby, the subject dropped.

The Record of Title (Ireland) Bill, the Sheep and Cattle Bill, and the Union Officers (Ireland) Superannuation Bill, were read a third time, and passed.

* But see his Lordship's remark, infra.

Tuesday, May 16.

The Marriages (Lambourne) Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Commons' Amendment to Lords' Amendments in the Private Bill Costs Bill was considered and agreed to.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY (VINERIAN FOUNDATION) BILL.

The Earl of Derby, in moving the second reading of this bill, said its object was to enable the University of Oxford to pass a statute amending a statute which had been already passed in pursuance of the will of Charles Viner. The Vinerian foundation arose from the will of Charles Viner, who died in 1755, and bequeathed the whole of his very valuable library and a bequest worth 12,000*l.* to the University, and if all who had been at the University had been actuated by the same conscientious motives, that seat of learning would have been enriched, indeed; for Mr. Viner stated that his grant was given to the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University, "in order to make some amends for my indiscretion there in infancy." He then proceeded to specify his objects, one of which was for nominating, appointing, and establishing a professorship of Common Law at the University, and putting it upon a proper footing, in order that young gentlemen who might be students there might be instructed and enabled to pursue their studies when attending the courts at Westminster, and might not trifle away their time by hearing what they understood nothing of, and thereby divert their minds from the study of the law to their own prejudice. For the purpose of effecting this very laudable object, it was proposed that, out of a portion of the residue of the funds, provision should be made for publishing a supplement of his own Abridgement of the Law, and also appointing, as far as the funds would allow, one or more fellowships and scholarships. The Abridgement to which he referred consisted of twenty-four large volumes, and the supplement had been published, he believed, in the small compass of six additional volumes. The University, desiring to act entirely in concert with the intentions of the original founder, wished to make some modifications in the statute in question, so as to enable them to have a resident Professor. But upon proposing to make those alterations they were informed by the present Attorney-General that it was doubtful whether they could modify it at all, because the statute formerly passed was in conformity with the precise terms of the will of the founder. It was to enable them to make the necessary alterations that this bill was introduced. The proposed modification had been sanctioned by the Hebdomadal Council, and had been unanimously approved by the Council of Convocation. The bill had been introduced into the other House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the member for the University, and the Attorney-General, its counsel, and had passed without opposition. He trusted it would be received equally without objection by their Lordships. He begged to move the second reading of the bill.

The bill was read a second time.

The report of an amendment in the Married Women's Property (Ireland) Bill was received.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Friday, May 12.

CROWN SUITS, &c.

The Attorney-General obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the procedure and practice in Crown suits in the Court of Exchequer, and for other purposes.

The bill was brought in and read a first time.

Tuesday, May 16.

THE PATENT LAWS.

In answer to Mr. Cox,

The Attorney-General said, this bill had been in course of preparation with the full expectation of its being introduced this session, but further consideration had rather added to the difficulties attendant on the subject, and it would be hopeless to think of passing such a bill this session.

THE BANKRUPTCY LAWS.

Mr. Maffatt rose to call attention to the report of the select committee on the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, and the existing state of the laws in regard to debtor and creditor; and to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the report of the select committee on the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, deserves the prompt and serious consideration of her Majesty's Government." The hon. gentleman reviewed the changes which had taken place in reference to the law of bankruptcy during the last forty years, and remarked, that the Consolidation Act of 1840, instead of improving the then existing system, had rather tended to make matters worse. The bankruptcy laws were at the present time in a highly unsatisfactory state; and the act of 1861 had produced results which no man connected with the commerce of the country could possibly have anticipated. In the first place, it had merged the trading with the non-trading community, and had led the whole mercantile world to avoid the Bankruptcy Court as much as possible, in consequence of the expense and delay in the course of procedure. There was collected out of bankruptcy in the last year 677,000*l.*, and the cost of collection and official charges was 140,000*l.*, leaving but 530,000*l.* for the creditors from the whole of the bankruptcies of the United Kingdom. If he compared that with the year 1843, when the commerce of the country bore no comparison to the present, the amount of the bankruptcies was 1,067,000*l.* That was not surprising, if they analysed the account of last year, for of 7324 bankruptcies, 6800 were made on the bankrupts' own petition, without leave of the creditors, and 595 at the instance of the creditors. Out of 6600, only 5324 paid any dividend, and out of the whole 7324 only 80 were refused prompt discharge. Practically now, in the case of every estate where there was a prospect of a dividend, any kind of compromise or assignment was agreed to rather than go to the Court of Bankruptcy; and the natural sequence of it was, that every debtor knew he had an instrument at hand by which he could cheat his creditors. This was done in two ways, as inaugurated in the act of 1861, by composition or assignment. The practice of allowing debtors to evade their creditors was telling upon the mercantile position of the country, as was shewn by the fact, that whereas in 1843 there were 640 compositions only, there were, in 1864, 1348; and in the last three months of that year there were no less than 302 for less than 5*s.* in the pound, some being as low as 6*d.* and 3*d.* The great mass of insolvencies might be said to be settled under assignment. Scarcely a week passed in which some two or three firms extensively engaged in business did not suspend payment, placing their affairs in the hands of their solicitors or friendly accountants, who said to the creditors, "We will look into the books and tell you what you can get;" and in this way the creditors were kept at bay. The friendly accountants, although some of them were of the highest respectability, took the books as they found them, and the consequence was, that any malversation or abstraction from the assets might pass undisturbed. A composition was announced, which the creditors ordinarily were content to take, but there was generally a serious difference between the money result and the statement first made, and he had known several instances of estates which upon the first shewing promised to pay 20*s.* in the pound, the debts of which might now be bought for 2*s.* or 3*s.* in the pound. In November of last year the debts put into composition were 3,938,000*l.*, and in December 4,049,000*l.*, or at the rate of 48,000,000*l.* a year: and this was shewn not to be the result of a period of extreme pressure but a normal state of things; for the number of deeds registered in those two months was 900, with a stamp duty of 6000*l.*, while the number for the six months ending the 11th April was 2800, with a stamp duty of 15,614*l.*; and the stamp duty was only a partial test, as it only extended to 80,000*l.* What, then, was the remedy? Scarcely anything had been suggested except the introduction of the Scotch practice. All the attacks upon Lord Brougham's bill were upon the question of patronage, but nothing was said with respect to the benefit of the estate, and the same thing occurred in the case of the evidence taken before the committee last session. The present system was essentially and fundamentally wrong. The real principle was to let the creditors manage their own affairs with the debtors, and for the State to interfere as little as possible. If the debtor were guilty of fraud, let him be tried by the ordinary tribunals of the country; but the creditor should not have the power of punishing the debtor in any way. The committee proposed to abolish imprisonment for debt, to take away from the creditor the power of covering the body of his debtor. It was also proposed that the creditors should have the freest access to the property of the debtor, which from the time of the insolvency should be vested in their own management. They proposed to abolish the present system of bankruptcy, and in lieu thereof that creditors should have the power of choosing their own officers, and managing their own affairs themselves. But there was this difficulty, that it was practically impossible to get individual creditors to look after their own affairs and those of other creditors. It was proposed to abolish altogether, as soon as practicable, the whole system of bankruptcy as it now existed, than which it was not possible to devise a worse system. The change suggested had the most careful consideration of the committee, and they were encouraged in the bold course they had taken by communication which had been made to them by the Lord Chancellor, the plan in whose bill, in fact, they had almost entirely adopted. The committee, however, did not concur with the noble and learned Lord with respect to making the discharge of the debtor depend entirely upon the acquiescence of the creditor. If the recommendations of the committee are now laid on the table, and which were the result of great care, deliberation, and thought, were passed into law, he believed they would produce the greatest possible benefit to the commerce of the country.

Mr. Ayrton seconded the motion, and said, he thought it had been sufficiently shewn that the present bankruptcy law had entirely failed; but if that was the only result at which Parliament had arrived after devoting itself for nearly 300 years to the subject, he could not help, as a member of the committee, feeling some distrust in the decision at which they had arrived; and so great was his own diffidence, that he would have abandoned the question, only that he believed there was underlying the whole system of legislation some great radical errors, which it was the object of the resolutions of the committee to remove. One evil of the present system was the relying on the imprisonment of the debtor at the instance of the creditor as the best means of getting satisfaction for the debt. It was not a little remarkable, that in this country, which set so great a value on liberty, there was so little respect for the liberty of debtors. Perhaps this neglect about the personal liberty of the debtor was a relic of an age of violence. Unfortunately, the law as it now existed only took cognisance of that description of property which could be disposed of by the officer of the court, and hence full satisfaction for the judgment could not be obtained. Imprisonment for debt seemed to defeat the very object of the creditor, for if the debtor was possessed of no property, nothing was gained by putting him in prison. By imprisonment a debtor having any trade or profession, he was thereby deprived of the means of paying off any claims upon him. There was another evil connected with the system, namely, that of losing sight of the line of demarcation between civil and criminal proceedings—proceedings to obtain satisfaction for a debt, and those resorted to for the purpose of punishment. The committee came to the conclusion, that it was absolutely necessary to sweep away those underlying fallacies, and insist upon the total abolition of imprisonment for debt. When, however, a debtor sought to abscond, it was necessary to take precautionary measures, and the committee therefore resolved that the power of detaining an absconding debtor should be retained. The committee next resolved, that the power of issuing a summons requiring a debtor to appear which had been restricted to debts above 50*l.*, should be extended to all descriptions of claims which could be preferred. So that if the view of the committee were adopted, and imprisonment ceased, there would be the amplest opportunity given to the creditor to enforce his claim to the full extent of the property of the debtor. This would reduce bankruptcy in practice to the simple condition of a man being unable to meet the demands of his creditors, retaining only that portion of the previous law which declared that acts in anticipation of insolvency should itself constitute bankruptcy. It would then no longer be necessary to have courts of justice established all over the country for the mere purpose of making a man bankrupt. The process would be reduced to a simple act of record or authentication of the status of the bankrupt by an officer. That function, the committee thought, could be performed by the county courts all over the country, and to meet the special case of the metropolis by the foundation of a new court. A consideration of the position of secured creditors, and of the fact that they exercised an influence over the bankrupt's estate, which generally led to the appointment of assignees favourable to their claims, induced the committee to resolve, that after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt should be left exactly as he was before, without any change being made in the custody of his property, he being responsible to his creditors for its safe custody; and that only the unsecured creditors should be allowed to direct the administration of the estate.

Here the House was counted out.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, MAY 27, 1865.

THE powers of district boards in carrying out the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Acts, 1855 and 1863, and dealing with the sewage of their districts, have recently been very much considered in the case of Cator v. The Board of Works for the Lewisham District, in the Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 340). The drainage of the district of Lewisham had for many years been carried into a stream called the County Bridge stream at a point within the Lewisham district, the County Bridge stream flowing thence onwards until it fell into the Poole river, a natural stream of considerable width and depth, both streams passing through land belonging to the plaintiff beyond the limits of the Lewisham district. Part of the Lewisham district being greatly in want of additional drainage, the board of health for the district executed certain drainage works, and availed themselves as they had done before of the County Bridge stream to carry off the sewage matter.

The effect of the additional drainage was to cause a great quantity of offensive matter to pass down into the County Bridge stream and Poole river, and the water, which was before affected by the drainage only in an inappreciable degree, became polluted to such an extent as to cause substantial injury to the plaintiff. The special case stating, that the effect of the increased discharge from the sewers into the County Bridge stream and the Poole river was to render them foul, stinking, and wholly unfit for cattle or ordinary domestic purposes.

It did not appear to be disputed that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the injury he had sustained; but the question was, whether his remedy was by action at law for damages, or by proceeding to obtain compensation under the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; and incidentally to this question, the powers of district boards as to entry on land, and the conduct and deposit of sewage matter, were discussed and considered. It should be premised, that by sect. 86 every vestry and district board is directed to cause offensive ponds, pools, ditches, drains, &c. to be cleansed or covered, or to construct proper sewers for the discharge of sewage matter, or to do such other works as the case may require; that is to say, such as may be necessary for the abatement of the nuisance caused by such ponds and ditches, if the owner or occupier of the premises where the nuisance exists fails to do so after notice given as specified in the act; and it seems to have been admitted by both sides that the drainage works executed by the Lewisham board in this case were such as were fully authorised by the act, but for the pollution of the streams by the pouring of the sewage matter into them, and injurious consequences resulting therefrom. The 86th section also contains a proviso, that where work done by any vestry or district board in pursuance of the act interferes with or prejudicially affects any ancient mill, or any right connected therewith, or other right to the use of water, full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining damage thereby, and also gives the vestry or district board the right to contract for the purchase of such mill or any such right connected therewith, or other right to the use of water in the manner provided by the act. The Court of Queen's Bench seems to have considered, that as the drainage works were within the district, and such as in themselves were authorised by the statute, the outfall into the river also, quoad any damage within the district, was also clearly authorised; and that, therefore, as to such damage, the only remedy was under the compensation clause, and not by action; and that, therefore, the only difficulty the Court had to deal with, was how the damage was to be treated, which arose, as in this case, beyond the Lewisham district; the question being, was this also matter for compensation, under the 86th section, or was it ground for an action at law?

Mr. Justice Blackburn, in delivering the judgment of the Court, which was not come to without doubt and hesitation, said that they thought it could not be disputed, that had the damage to the plaintiff occurred within the district, the only redress to which he would have been entitled would have been by proceeding for compensation, under the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; for that it was plain that that section contemplated, and provided for the possibility of, damage being done to water rights by the execution of sewerage works, and would comprehend a case in which a stream was polluted by offensive matter being discharged into it; and after remarking, with reference to the 58th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, which had been argued from, as shewing that an express statutory enactment was necessary to give a district board any power beyond the district, that that section related to works to be executed beyond the limits of the district, not to damages arising without the district for works executed within it, he proceeded to state that the Court gave judgment for the defendant, that an action would not lie; and the principal grounds on which the Court went may be shortly stated to be, that damages beyond the district, by reason of works executed within the district, was matter for compensation, within the meaning of the 86th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120; and that to hold the contrary would be to cripple the powers of district boards, who could not then avail themselves, for the purpose of drainage, of streams flowing beyond the local limits, because, if any damage should occur to the proprietors or occupiers further down the stream from its pollution, they might, if it were actionable, be compelled, by repeated actions, to entirely undo the works which had caused such damage; and that the Court did not think that the Legislature intended to place such a restraint on the powers of the local authority.

The Court thus entering on a question of general policy, and evidently desirous of taking a liberal view of the powers conferred by these acts, seems to have overlooked the fact that the great and manifest object of these sanitary institutions, as devised by the Legislature, is to remove nuisances, and as far as possible to extend the domains of cleanliness and purity, but not by any means to create new nuisances, and that it is quite incompatible with the avowed functions of a district board that they should have power to turn a pure river into a filthy cesspool, and simply transfer in another form to another district those evils which may exist in their own. Here the sewage matter became a nuisance, both in and out of the district, by its discharge into the County Bridge stream, and its necessary course onwards, into the Poole river. The powers of these district boards will not be by any means paralysed by a rule of law that forbids them to create a nuisance in adjoining districts, by means of filth. If there is no natural outlet of such a character, and so situated that the sewage matter may be innocuously discharged by means of it, they may adopt some artificial method of disposing of the sewage matter, or they may transfer the drainage to the general board, who have more extended powers of cutting artificial drains to carry the sewage to a distant outlet, and it seems most reasonable to hold that they must not, in their attention to the sanitary wants of their own district, by any means inflict a new nuisance on another.

The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was reversed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but not unanimously, as two of the learned judges were of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be affirmed. We must refer to the judgments delivered seriatim for a full account of the views of the learned judges on the different points raised in the case. First, the Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Pigott adopted the views of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the Chief Baron adverted to the circumstance that the drainage of the district had actually flowed into these streams, though not so as to create any nuisance, prior to the discharge of the increased sewage, and that what the defendants had done was only so to construct the drains as to enable them to carry off, not merely that which theretofore was carried off, but which ought to be carried off in order that the defendants might obey the act, and render the district healthy. Baron Bramwell, on the other hand, went very closely into different sections of the statute, and pointed out that the board, by the terms of the act, had no right to purchase land by compulsion, but could only do so by agreement; and that it would be singular if, though they could not take a man's land, they could yet foul and spoil it, and, as the right was claimed on the ground of convenience, he did not see why, if such a right existed, they might not turn the sewage into any pond in his field, or into any of his fields that might lie low, there to find its way out in the way it might happen to do. Still he admitted it might be that there was such a power by implication, but he observed that it did not appear that they could not do the drainage in any other way; that they might go to the Metropolitan Board if they could not otherwise do it; and that if they could not do it at all, and no one could do it, then, as the Legislature did not order an impossibility to be done, they must do it as far as they could; and that, in his opinion, the section which directed the act to be done did not by implication give a power either of taking land, or spoiling land, or a pond, or a stream, in the way in which it had been done in that case. He also referred to the terms of the 69th section, where powers are given to carry such sewers or works through, across, or under turnpike roads, &c., or through or under "any cellar or vault which may be under the pavement or carriage way of any street, and into, through, or under any lands whatsoever;" and observed, that the expressions "into, through, or under" manifestly did not mean to take it into, and there to leave it; and that it therefore must be read "into, through, or under;" that is to say, you may take it in, and you must take it out either by "through or under." The proviso under the 86th section, as to where any right to water is affected, he read as meaning, that where any work is done, or is required to be done, by any vestry or local board, in pursuance of the provisions of the act, which affects such right, they shall give compensation, but as not meaning that they may do something which otherwise, but for the proviso, they could not do. On the question of necessity, Mr. Justice Byles observed, that absolute physical necessity there could not be; the sewage might be removed in carts or suitable vehicles, however expensive that might be; nor did necessity in the lowest sense of the term exist—that is, of doing the thing, or an alternative so expensive as to be commercially impossible; for by sect. 89, the district board had the option of turning over the drainage to the general board, who had power to cut an artificial drain, which might effectually dispose of the sewage in the common stream. The proviso in sect. 86, he thought, might well apply to an interference with a temporary use of water; but he was of opinion that water rights could not be absolutely taken by compulsion, any more than land, but were made the subject of voluntary purchase only.

We refer, in conclusion, to the elaborate judgment of Chief Justice Erle, who concurred in the reversal of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and in the course of his judgment referred to sects. 150, 151, and 170, shewing it to be clear, from these provisions, that the district board cannot take land, or any right or easement over it.

The following, then, are the conclusions which may be drawn for the practical information of vestry and district boards, under the Metropolis Local Management Acts, from the dicta and judgments in the above case.

They cannot take land by compulsion, neither can they take by compulsion, any right or easement over land.

Those are subjects only of voluntary sale and purchase; and, as they cannot take the land of any individual, they cannot foul or spoil it, or the water on it, or, without consent, make it the place of outfall or deposit for the sewage. The right to carry the drains into, through, or under any land whatsoever, is given to them for the purpose of the transport and conveyance of the sewage, and they must so manage it as not by their acts to create a nuisance, either in their own district, or in any other. If there be no natural outlet of such a situation and character, that the sewage may be innocuously discharged there, they must construct an artificial place of deposit, and, if they find the undertaking too great, and the burthen too heavy for them, they may, under the provisions of sect. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, turn over the drainage to the Metropolitan Board of Works.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—Fallacies and misrepresentations in important public documents ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed; I therefore crave space for the following examination of that part of the Special Report of the New York Commissioners for the Codification of the Law (lately printed by you, ante, p. 160), which professes to state the case of the codists against the anti-codists. I will quote and comment on the Report sentence by sentence, without further preface.

"The question, whether a code is desirable, is simply a question between written and unwritten law."

That is not the question at all. The question is, whether, our law being now in a non-statutory form, it is desirable to abolish it, and enact statutory law in its place.

"That this was ever debatable is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of jurisprudence. If the law is a thing to be obeyed, it is a thing to be known; and if it is to be known, there can be no better, not to say no other, method of making it known than of writing and publishing it."

The words "written" and "unwritten" are less clumsy ones than "statutory" and "non-statutory;" but they are unfortunately ambiguous, and this ambiguity is the foundation of nearly the whole of the commissioners' arguments. They make out that the law ought to be "written," and then they silently assume that no law can be "written" law, unless it is in the form of a code. Nobody denies that it is desirable that what is to be known should be written and published; but our Reports and Text-books are written and published. What the opponents of codification contend is, that by the method of deduction from precedents and the other sources of non-statutory law, the law applicable to any given case as it arises can practically be ascertained with more certainty, and that the law so ascertained will be better than by the method of giving the judges nothing but an abstract proposition as their guide. This view may or may not be correct; but it is unworthy of the commissioners to bolster up their cause by a mere verbal quibble on the words "written" and "unwritten." Another confusion of ideas which pervades the commissioners' remarks may be noticed here. They do not seem to feel the difference between the two questions—how is a legislator to enact a new law? and how should a legislator deal with an existing body of law (or materials for the development of law as wanted), such as we now possess? If you want to make a new law you must enact it in the form of a general proposition; but there is (to say the least) no necessity for enacting a general proposition, in order to have the benefit of the existing state of things.

"If a written constitution is desirable, so are written laws. The same reasons which affect the one affect also the other."

On this side of the Atlantic it will probably be sufficient to let this remark pass, merely adding the corollary, that if a written (codified) constitution is not desirable, neither are written (codified) laws.

"There may be countries where the conflicts between the different orders in a State render a written definition of their relative rights a difficult or an impossible task; and there, of course, a written constitution is not likely to be attempted; and because a written constitution is not thought desirable, written laws are supposed to be undesirable. These reasons have no application to this country. We have no orders in the State, no classes of society clashing with each other."

For "written" read "codified" throughout. A little blindness is allowed to patriots lauding their country; and a little more to doctrinaires lauding their p t scheme; but is it not astonishing that, even under the combined influence of both causes of obfuscation, the commissioners should have been able to persuade themselves, that in the State of New York there are no "orders" and no "classes of society clashing with each other!" There must be such in every conceivable community of men.

"The will of the people is the supreme law; that will is fully expressed by their written constitution and their written laws. It should seem, indeed, to have no other fit expression."

As to the will of the people being the supreme law, I confess myself unable to attach any definite meaning to the statement, in connexion with the questions under consideration. Do the learned commissioners mean, that if Smith has a dispute with Jones about the boundary of a field, he is obliged to ask the people what is its will before he can get his rights ascertained? If so, that supreme law is certainly not codified. But if they only mean to remind us that, for the purposes of legislation, supreme legislative power must be deemed to reside somewhere, why should codified laws be a more fit expression of the supreme will of the "people" than of the supreme will of a Parliament, or of an Emperor? This is very bewildering.

"There are those who argue, that an unwritten law is more favourable to liberty than a written one."

I am not aware that anybody ever argued thus. It certainly has been argued (and in my opinion successfully, but that is beside the question), that the law is likely to be better and more easily ascertained in practice when uncoded than when codified. (I speak of "uncodified law" for convenience; my meaning will be understood).

"The contrary should seem to be more consonant with reason. It can scarcely be thought favourable to the liberty of the citizen, that he should be governed by laws of which he is ignorant!"

Who ever said or thought that it could be? But the opponents of codification contend that the citizen can ascertain and apply the law at least as well from uncoded sources, as from a code.

"And it can as little be thought, that his knowledge of the laws is promoted by their being kept from print, or from authentic statement in a written form."

To talk of the laws being "kept from print" is mere trifling. The commissioners hardly mean to allege that nothing but a code is capable of being printed? By "authentic statement in a written form," they mean, of course, "reduction to abstract propositions and enactment in a code," in a word, codification; consequently, the argument in this sentence amounts to this—that the law ought to be codified, because it can hardly be thought that the citizen's knowledge of it is promoted by its being kept uncoded; which is only a roundabout way of saying, because it ought to be codified.

"Whatever is known to the judge or to the lawyer can be written, and whatever has been written in the treatises of lawyers, or the opinions of judges, can be written in a systematic code."

Here is a new juggle on the word "written." Of course what has been written once can be written again, that is, copied; but, in order to make this sentence an argument in favour of codification, "written" must mean "reduced to abstract propositions in such a way as to be more practically available for ascertaining the law in future cases than the treatises and opinions of lawyers and judges are in their present form;" the feasibility of which mode of "writing" is at any rate not self-evident.

"It is no answer, to say that nothing can be written which will not be susceptible of different interpretations. That may be true.

"But it is no more susceptible of different interpretations when written in a code than when written in the reports."

What the commissioners refer to by "it" is not very clear; but the sentence is intelligible enough to convict the commissioners of an inability to see the essential difference between an abstract rule and a precedent, which, considering how they have been employed all these years, is really surprising. When they speak of abstract rules being susceptible of different interpretations they refer (I suppose) to the difficulty of applying such rules to particular cases as they arise; but a report of a case lays down no rule; it is an historical record; the facts were so and so, the judgment was so and so. As far as it goes, it is firm ground on which to found an inference, and as little susceptible of different interpretations as anything well can be. Different inferences may, no doubt, be drawn from it in the process of evolving the law on a new case; and you may say that it is susceptible to different interpretations in this sense, if you like; but, at any rate, this susceptibility in precedents is so radically different from the susceptibility of general rules, that no comparison between them is possible.

"On the contrary, when expressed with care, for the very purpose of stating a rule which is to govern all cases alike, there is more likelihood of precision in language than when expressed with reference to a particular case."

After so much confusion of ideas, it is not surprising that the commissioners should begin to get a little hazy in their grammar also. I have real difficulty in attaching a definite meaning to this paragraph, but I suppose something of this kind is intended—that a writer expressing himself with care, for the very purpose of stating a rule which is to govern all cases alike, is more likely to use precise language than if he were only deciding a particular case. If this is the intended meaning, it is only another instance of an attempt to compare things of different natures. The codifier's business is to lay down a general rule; the judge's, to decide a particular case; and whether the commissioners have or have not any warrant for suggesting that a codifier is more likely to be careful and precise in discharging his task than a judge in discharging his, the whole paragraph is entirely beside the real question at issue. I may add, that in contrasting the merits of two processes, it cannot be fair to assume that the favoured one will be performed with more care than the other.

I here leave the commissioners. You will please to observe that my only object has been to expose the fallacy of the arguments used by them. I do not say that there are not better arguments in favour of codification, nor have I attempted to state the arguments against it.

The Law and Practice of the Court of Probate, Contentious and Common Form, with the Rules, Statutes, and Forms. By PHILIP WILLIAM DODD, Solicitor, and GEORGE HENRY BROOKE, Proctor in Doctors' Commons. 8vo., pp. 1310.

[Stevens, Sons, & Haynes.]

THIS work is put forth as the result of six years' labour, and we can readily believe that the task of preparing it has been sufficient to occupy nearly all the leisure of two professional lives during that period. It is a bulky volume, but the bulk represents value, and includes a nearly exhaustive treatise on the subject indicated by the title of the book. The following is a brief epitome of the table of contents:—

Part I.—Introduction. 1. Sketch of the practice of the Prerogative Court, on which that of the Court of Probate is founded. 2. Jurisdiction and constitution of the Court of Probate, and status of the practitioners therein.

Part II.—Factum of a will. 1. Local law. 2. Capacity. 3. Characteristic of testamentary instruments; joint mutual, &c. wills. 4. Execution of wills under the former and the existing laws. 5. Wills of soldiers and seamen. 6. Wills under powers. 7. Contingent wills. 8. Alterations in wills. 9. Revocation. 10. Revival and republication.

Part III.—Common form business. 1. Executors, who may be; renunciation of, and succession to, the office. 2. Probate, and its effect; practice. 3. Administration, who may be appointed; qualified administrators; practice; origin of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; distribution; escheated personalty. 4. Confirmations; Irish grants and English grants to operate in Ireland and Scotland; note on confirmation and executorship, and distribution in Scotland [a very carefully prepared and useful note.] 5. Amendment of grants. 6. Surrender and revocation of grants. 7. Declaration and inventory. 8. Commission of appraisalment. 9. Probate duties. 10. Deposit of wills.

Part IV.—Contentious business. 1. Parties in regard to interest. 2. Interveners. 3. Proxies. 4. Paupers. 5. Proof in solemn form. 6. Causes of interest. 7. Suit for investing and account. 8. Proceedings on administration bond. 9. Caveat. 10. Citation. 11. Appearance. 12. Affidavits as to script. 13. Proceedings by plea and proof. 14. By default. 15. Issues. 16. New trials. 17. Demurrer. 18. Act on petition. 19. Motions. 20. Order for production. 21. Costs. 22. Enforcing decrees and orders. 23. Affidavits. 24. Examination of witnesses. 25. Discovery. 26. Security for costs. 27. Payment into and out of court. 28. Appeals from county courts. 29. Appeals to House of Lords. 30. Cause of nullity.

Appendices of statutes, rules, forms, fees, and costs.

Although the first chapter opens with a quotation from Ariosto, and there is throughout the work, on the part of the authors, or of one of them, a greater display of ultra professional reading than we are accustomed to expect in legal treatises, we are bound to say that the work is, as a whole, thoroughly practical, complete, and reliable. Occasionally the reports themselves furnish matter of a kind which Lord Lyndhurst was accustomed to describe as "ornamental." Thus, in illustration of the qualification of the general proposition as to the conclusiveness of a probate, that the Court must have jurisdiction; so that it may be shewn, for example, that the supposed testator is alive, we are told in a note, that "the late Sir Charles James money lent on the condition of receiving a share of profits, and that lent at a fixed rate of interest, so far as the general creditor was concerned. There might be fraud connected with the withdrawal in both cases, but the law would reach a transaction of that kind.

Mr. Bovill challenged any member of the Government to deny, that under the wording of the clause cases similar to that which occurred at Liverpool might not happen every day. A man lending 50,000*l.* might draw out of the profits of the concern 100,000*l.*, assuming that so much was made in the course of a single year, and after that might draw out his 50,000*l.*; and yet in the next year, if it happened to be a season of loss, he would be absolved from any liability whatever.

The Solicitor-General said the bill did not absolve anybody, and simply enabled a man, instead of lending money at a fixed rate of interest, to take a certain share of profits without becoming a partner. If no profits were made he did not receive anything, and to that extent inchoed less on the general fund available for creditors than if he took a fixed rate of interest.

Mr. Horsfall admitted that the clause did put the lender in a somewhat advantageous position, but suggested as a safeguard that some limit might be fixed within which money drawn out should still be liable to the debts in case of bankruptcy before that period had expired.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 2 was temporarily postponed; and clause 3 was agreed to, with a verbal amendment, suggested by Mr. Horsfall.

Clause 2 was then taken up again, and several verbal amendments having been made in it.

Mr. Moor opposed the motion, that it be agreed to as amended. In doing so he felt that he was not opposing, but forwarding, the principle of the bill, clause 2 being inconsistent with its immediate predecessor. The object of the bill was to encourage loans of money to traders; but by this second clause the lender was subjected to this penalty—that he should not be repaid his loan in case the trader became bankrupt until all the creditors were first satisfied. That amounted to an absolute prohibition; for in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a trader failed to pay 20*s.* in the pound. No person would lend money on such conditions, when by lending upon a promissory note or a bill of exchange he could get 30*l.*, 40*l.*, or 50*l.* per cent. interest; and if the worst came to the worst still be able to go in and prove his debts, and receive an equal dividend with all the other creditors.

The Attorney-General said, the strongest argument in favour of the present state of the law was, that a man might positively, under a change of the law, carry on a business which was not substantially his own without incurring the risks of the business. Now, this bill did not in any way interfere with the person carrying on a trade. Credit was given to the trader on account of his visible means or stock-in-trade. But, supposing the person who went shares in the risk furnished all the means, then the whole resources of the undertaking would be derived from the loan so made, and the person who advanced the money had sent the trader into the world with the appearance of solvency, the stock-in-trade ought in the first instance to be subject to the ordinary creditors. It had been suggested that the real trader might not hold out his name to the world; that he might furnish all the means, and stipulate for the whole of the profits, and in that way avoid running any risk. Well, this clause was intended to supply a practical security against any evasion of the law of that description. What was proposed by the hon. member for Brighton would go a vast deal further, for it would enable the person who might be the real trader to come in at the last moment and sweep away the ostensible means of business with the other creditors, or perhaps in preference to them. It might be said that the possibility was left open of practically doing the same thing by means of loans at an exorbitant interest. That was an objection which deserved to be carefully considered. His own opinion would be by no means unfavourable to the drawing of a line, if it could be done, beyond which it should be determined that a high rate of interest was a mere cover, and of placing such persons in the same situation as the lender who contracted for a share of the profits. But they had better do one thing at a time. They were dealing now with an important branch of the law of partnership, and he believed the proposed change would be a great boon to the trader. Let them do what they could do at present, and under such safeguards as they believed to be desirable and good, and if found to work well, it might afterwards be considered whether there were not other cases to which it might be expedient that the same rule should be extended. But there was an important practical distinction between the cases. If the person carrying on trade borrowed money at an exorbitant interest, he made himself liable to pay both that interest and the capital, whether the business was prosperous or the reverse. That person would see, therefore, that it was very much to his advantage to procure money on the terms of sharing in the profits, and it would be also to the advantage of the lender to lend upon such terms. He was of opinion, then, that they would be proceeding safely and cautiously, and taking good securities against abuse if they were to adopt this clause.

Mr. Henley was not convinced by the arguments of the hon. and learned gentleman. It was clear that the Government were afraid of their own measure. He had voted for the second reading, because to lend money in the way proposed by the bill was a fair legal transaction. But he did not see why they should put a penalty on that which they said was a loan. If the Attorney-General's argument was sound, he doubted whether the bill was sound.

The Attorney-General said, that if a man lent money at the ordinary rate of interest, he could not be said to be investing it in the business, because he left all the benefit as well as all the risk to the man who was carrying on the trade.

Mr. Hubbard said, that of the two arguments, that of the hon. member for Brighton appeared to him more consistent. If the lender had nothing to do with the loss while the trader lived, why should he be saddled with the loss when the trader died? He agreed with the Attorney-General that it might become necessary to bring in a bill to put some check on the rate of interest in certain transactions. Hon. members talked of the ordinary rate of interest, but the interest of money had varied from 1*l.* 10*s.* to 10*l.* per cent. within a few years. There was now no such thing as a legal rate of interest. He would not vote for the expurgation of the clause.

The clause was then agreed to, as were the other clauses.

On the motion of Mr. Milner Gibson, a new clause declaring that the receipt of profits in consideration of the sale of goods shall not make the seller a partner, was agreed to and added to the bill.

Mr. J. Peel, who had given notice of a new clause providing for the registration of lenders and borrowers, said, that as the hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Selwyn) had placed upon the paper a new clause on registration he would not press his own clause, but would accept that of the hon. and learned member, with the addition of a few words which he would propose.

Mr. Horsfall said that there was a great difference between the two clauses, and he much preferred that of the hon. member for Tamworth.

Mr. Selwyn, in moving a new clause providing for registry by the registrar of joint-stock companies, said that it was similar in principle to one which was carried in committee last year, and added to the bill. He did not dispute that limited liability had met with large success, and had made much progress; but the House ought also to remember the very large losses which had been occasioned by it, and the litigation to which it had given rise. No doubt it had been well received by the mercantile world, but experience had shewn the wisdom of Parliament in the safeguards it had provided, and especially in compelling companies to use the word "limited" in their titles. He trusted that the House would proceed with the same caution. The hon. member for Bridport had on a former occasion put before the House what was called the sentimental view of the subject. He had imagined the case of a young man of industry and ability, but lacking means, and he said it was very hard that a capitalist could not lend this young man money with which to carry on his business without making himself liable for his last acre and his last shilling. The House might assume that the capitalist, like most others of his class, would take care of himself. He might stipulate for 19-20ths of the profits, and the interesting youth would get the rest. That being so, the latter would carry on business upon a different basis from that of his neighbours, and in all probability would be more speculative, because he had so little to lose. Ought not the public to have some safeguards in order that they might know the actual state of things? Of course, all would be well so long as the business prospered, but when the crash came, and the young man went into the Gazette, the 19-20ths of past profits would be beyond the reach of creditors. Thus, the tendency of the bill would be to increase throughout the country the aggregate of bad debts, which was already very large, had increased considerably under the influence of recent legislation, and was a heavy burthen not only upon creditors but the whole community. It was not too much to say that the price of everything we ate, drank, or wore was considerably enhanced by what was termed the allowance for bad debts, and that the aggregate amount was equal to that of any tax imposed for the benefit of the Imperial Exchequer. This bill would give facilities to capitalists for increasing the amount of bad debts throughout the country unless some safeguard were introduced for the protection of the public. The clause he proposed was in no way inquisitorial; it simply required that the fact that a person who was carrying on business on this system different from that of his neighbours, should be made known by the addition of the word "registered" to the style of his firm. It was said that this requirement would cast a stigma upon the firm, but in what did the stigma consist? There was no greater stigma in the use of the word "limited" in the case of a limited liability company. He proposed the following clause:—"A register shall be kept by the registrar of joint-stock companies, in which shall be entered the name of every person or partnership contracting any loan under the provisions of this act, and this act shall not apply to any person entitled to participate in the profits of any trade or undertaking unless the same shall be carried on under a name or firm concluding with the word 'registered,' and by some person or persons whose name or names, or whose style or firm, shall be entered in the said register."

Mr. Cave said that the case of a "limited" company was quite different from that of a firm availing itself of this bill. In one case the partners were not liable to the whole extent of their fortunes, and it was absolutely necessary that this fact should be known to the world. But here the persons who appeared before the world were liable to their last penny. Why, then, should the word "registered" be put after their names? Such a mark would really shew the public that they had a better security than they thought existed, and it would tempt them to give greater credit than before, because they would then know that they not only had the security of the partners whose names appeared, but the money of certain capitalists besides. (!)

Mr. T. Baring said that if this word was not a stigma, and was likely to give the firm a standing with the public, there could surely be no objection to the use of it, inasmuch as it would do the firm no harm, and supplied information which the public ought to know. These persons, though called lenders, were really traders; yet, while they shared the profits, they might guard themselves against a share of the loss. It was only fair to the public, then, that they should be apprised when any firm was profiting by the provisions of this bill.

Sir F. Crossley could not understand why registration should be required in the case of money lent at a variable rate of interest any more than when money was lent at a fixed rate. The House should take it for granted that people could conduct their own affairs, and would not trust others foolishly. The hon. and learned gentleman said that a person lending money might take almost all the profit of the business, but it was not likely that a man working a concern, and exerting all his ingenuity in carrying on the business, would allow nearly all the profits to be carried off by another. But whatever the arrangement might be, it was entirely matter of bargain between the borrower and lender, and he did not think that the use of the word "registered" was at all necessary.

Mr. Milner Gibson thought that the proposed clause, if added to the bill, would very much prevent it from being of any use. In looking back to past times they found that there had been constant difficulty about letting people make contracts with respect to money, and it was only after a great struggle that persons were permitted to borrow money at any rate of interest. It was now said, that if persons in trade borrowed money at a fluctuating rate of interest, they ought to be registered. He could see no sense in that proposition, and, indeed, he regarded it as opening a door to fraud, for a man might get a spurious credit by writing in a book in a public office, that some person had lent him 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* There was no provision in the clause against a fraudulent entry. No man was obliged to give another credit; and if people were asked to supply an individual with goods, or to lend him money, it was their business to see that he was a person who could be relied on. Seeing that all the members of great joint-stock associations possessed the advantage of limited liability, he thought that in justice the House should remove every obstacle now standing in the way of the operations of private traders.

Mr. Heygate supported the proposed clause.

The Attorney-General disclaimed the interpretation which had been put upon his former arguments by the hon. member for the University of Cambridge. What he had expressed last year, and what he still adhered to, was the opinion, that it was proper a partnership should appear to the world to be what it really was. Speaking of the bill brought forward last session by the hon. member for Birmingham, he had said, that if they created a new description of partnership, having in it some members with limited liability, and some without it, it was right that that new description of partnership should be advertised to the world as what it was—a partnership of a peculiar kind newly constituted under a particular law. But the present bill proceeded on a better principle than that measure of last year, making a man no longer a partner merely because he lent a sum of money to a trading concern. His hon. friend's amendment was absolutely needless as applied to the bill as it stood, and to be good for anything it ought to be carried much further than he intended to carry it.

Mr. C. Turner maintained that a man who lent money on condition of receiving a share of the profits was really and practically a partner. He was a partner as far as regarded the profits; the only thing was that the bill would relieve him from the position of a partner as far as regarded the losses. The President of the Board of Trade said there was no difference between a person who lent money for a rate of interest, and one who lent money for a share of the profits; but in practice there was a great distinction between them, and it seemed to him that the parties who objected in these cases to the word "registered" must be ashamed of the real nature of their transactions. If they meant fairly by the public, and did not intend to deceive it, he could not see why they should have any aversion to that word; and he should, therefore, cordially support the amendment.

Mr. Bovill said, that a division took place in the House last year on the very point they were now discussing, when the Attorney-General supported a clause to the same effect as that of the hon. member for the University of Cambridge. The House then affirmed the principle of registration, and thereupon the bill was abandoned.

The committee divided—

For the clause	65
Against	105

Majority against the clause 40

Mr. Horsfall then moved the clause of which the hon. member for Tamworth (Mr. J. Peel) had given notice, and which differed in one important respect from that which had just been negatived by the committee. The clause ran as follows:—"The names, addresses, and descriptions of the lender and borrower, the amount of the loan, the time of repayment, and the proportion of profits to be paid on the loan, shall be registered at the office for the registration of joint-stock companies; and any variation in the amount of the loan, or in the proportion of profit payable upon it, or any extension of time for repayment, shall also be registered in like manner."

The committee divided, the numbers being—

For the clause	59
Against it	101

Majority 12

Mr. Bovill then proposed a clause of which he had not given notice, the effect of which was understood to be that a lender, if he withdrew his capital on which the credit was created in case of bankruptcy, should be liable for the profits of the twelve months before the bankruptcy.

Mr. M. Gibson said it was inconvenient to discuss a clause of which notice had not been given; but he was informed that the law as it at present stood would meet what he understood to be the proposition of the hon. and learned gentleman.

Mr. Bovill said that certainly the law would not meet the case which he had suggested, and which would frequently occur under this bill.

The Attorney-General said that, in the judgment of his right hon. friend and his own too, the law as it was would do as much as it was politic or necessary to do, and would deal with all cases of collusion between debtor and creditor for the withdrawal of capital within the year of bankruptcy. Although he did not pretend to say there might not possibly be some cases in which creditors might be defrauded, he thought that the bill provided reasonable securities, by exposing to the risks of trade capital embarked in a business, and not withdrawn, and leaving to the operation of the law as it now stood cases in which such capital was collusively withdrawn.

Mr. C. Turner thought that some protection should be afforded to the public against cases in which capitalists embarked their money in a business with the intention of enjoying the profits, and put an irresponsible party forward as the owner of that business.

The clause was then negatived without a division.

Friday, May 19.

ATTORNEYS' CERTIFICATE DUTIES.

On the motion for going into committee of supply,

Mr. Denman rose to move that, in the opinion of this House, it is just and expedient that the annual duty payable upon certificates taken out by attorneys, solicitors, and proctors in England and Ireland, and by writers to the signet, solicitors, agents, attorneys, and procurators in Scotland, should be abolished. A few weeks ago the hon. and learned gentleman said he, in common with most other members, was entirely ignorant of the details of this tax, but having been waited on by various gentlemen representing that branch of the profession, he had promised to look into the matter; and having done so, he had come to the conclusion that they had a real grievance, and that this was one of the most unjust charges levied on any part of the community. Every solicitor and attorney must necessarily pass through an expensive education. When he took out his articles he had to pay a stamp duty of 80*l.*, and when he was admitted he had to pay a further tax of 25*l.*, making a total tax of 100 guineas—a larger sum than was paid by barristers or any other profession. The attorneys did not complain of this, however, for they thought that when paid it was done with once and for all, and they would not be called on to pay again. But that was not all. Before he could do a single thing, before he could know whether his business would be lucrative or not, he had to go to the Stamp-office, in the month of November or December, and pay a tax of 9*l.* in the metropolis, or 6*l.* in the country, which was a license for him to carry on his business during the year. The tax dated from the year 1785, when Mr. Pitt had a deficiency of 413,000*l.* to supply. Mr. Pitt did not mention the tax in his budget speech, but proposed a shop tax and a tax on maid servants, both of which were very unpopular; and in the debate which occurred, a Mr. Medley suggested, that instead of these duties a tax should be imposed on gentlemen of the bar and the solicitors. Other members supported the suggestion to tax lawyers, and Mr. Pitt said there were several motives of various kinds for the suggestion, among which he named "resentment." However, it was dangerous for private members to suggest new imposts to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; for it having turned out that there was a deficiency of 20,000*l.* on the shop tax, Mr. Pitt said he would resort to a tax against which he was not apprehensive of having any objection raised, viz. a tax "on certain practitioners in the law." Mr. Pitt acted on the hints which had been thrown out, by placing a tax of 5*l.* on London attorneys, and one of 3*l.* on country attorneys. He proposed at the same time to impose a tax of 2*s.* 6*d.* on each warrant of arrest which those attorneys issued. The latter impost, which the attorneys did not feel, had been abolished, but the other remained unaltered, or had been increased between the date at which it was laid on and the year 1815, and, in addition, a large sum was imposed as a payment on signing of articles and entrance to the profession. In 1815 the annual tax was again increased, and became 12*l.* for attorneys practising in London, and 8*l.* for those in the country; and so it remained till 1853, when an alteration was made by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, though several times from the year 1850 the House had shewn itself decidedly favourable to propositions made by the present Lord Ebury, then Lord Grosvenor, for the relief of the attorneys. In April, 1853, the second reading of the bill was postponed, on the understanding that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deal with this subject in his budget. That expectation, however, was not fulfilled, so far as the reduction of the annual certificate charges was concerned, and up to the present time the question had remained in abeyance. The total amount of this tax upon solicitors, attorneys, and writers to the signet in Great Britain was 88,980*l.* 10*s.* He trusted that Parliament would not, for the sake of so small a sum, continue to impose an unjust tax, which represented an additional income tax upon a suppositious income of 540*l.* per annum in London, and of 360*l.* in the country, when in fact the person taxed might not be earning a farthing. He had received by post a document which professed to come from auctioneers and pawnbrokers, giving a long list of what trades and professions were taxed. Few of those instances were analogous to the case now before the House; and even where there was an analogy, he should suggest to those who were anxious for relief, that their surer course would be to support the repeal of this duty, because the doing of justice to one trade or profession would increase the claims to relief of those which remained subject to exceptional taxation. Another argument against the abolition of this tax was, that the surplus was a very modest one; but no surplus could be considered a modest one which was, in fact, made up of the produce of an unjust tax. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, upon his responsibility, that this tax could not be parted with during the present year, he would not factiously press forward a bill to impair the surplus; but he was anxious that there should be no chance of its being said next year that the question had been allowed to slumber since 1859; and he desired to obtain an expression of the concurrence of this Parliament, with the opinions pronounced by the Parliaments of 1850 and 1853, that this was an unjust and inexpedient tax. If he obtained such an expression of opinion, he hoped that when the bill for the abolition of the duty was introduced early next session, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would bow to the decision of the House, and abandon the duty. The tax had been condemned by high authorities, for among those who voted for Lord R. Grosvenor's bill were the right hon. gentleman the member for Bucks, the hon. and learned member for Belfast, the present Solicitor-General, and Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving that, in the opinion of this House, it is just and expedient that the annual duty payable upon certificates taken out by attorneys, solicitors, and proctors in England and Ireland, and by writers to the signet, solicitors, agents, attorneys, and procurators in Scotland should be abolished.

Mr. Vance supported the amendment, observing that the tax pressed with the utmost severity on solicitors in Ireland, to which country it had not been extended until 1806, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day was under the influence of great pressure, and levied a tax upon silk stockings and persons wearing watches.

Mr. Hunt, while declining to enter into the merits of the question, protested against its being raised at the present moment, affecting, as it did, the interests of so many persons employed in electioneering throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. Humberston, Mr. Black, and Mr. Clay supported the amendment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer.—In rising to state the reasons which induce the Government to offer a stout resistance to the proposal of my hon. and learned friend, I shall not say one single word that can be construed into disrespect towards my hon. friend, or towards that most valuable and useful profession whose interests are in some degree involved in this debate. We know that vulgar insinuations are sometimes heard with regard to that profession, which, while it affords the noblest scope for the highest qualities, affords scope also for those that are lower. But for myself, I have always held the opinion, that a worthy and honourable solicitor is himself one of the most valuable members of society; nowhere is the principle of honour to be found in a purer state, and it is no less pure because it is combined with the most enlightened and disinterested prudence. I am sorry that the researches of my hon. friend, the member for Chester, into the Parliamentary history of this question, have stopped short of the point of greatest interest. I am not going to allege that there has been any compact; the solicitors are free to raise this question at any time, and in any manner they think fit. But I so far agree with what has fallen from the hon. member for Northamptonshire, that I do think the external proprieties would have been more consulted, if the application for the removal of this tax had been made at a period somewhat more remote from the great event likely to happen in a few months. After a long Parliamentary agitation of this question, the House of Commons in 1853 came to a decision, the result of which forms the last Parliamentary declaration on the subject. In favour of the second reading of the bill for abolishing this duty, 102 ayes voted, but the measure was negatived by 186 noes. My hon. friend quoted with great emphasis and unction some words of Chief Justice Cockburn, who, at one period of his life, ill advised and imperfectly informed, thought fit to denounce this duty. But the latest and most important act of Chief Justice Cockburn was in a very different sense; and my hon. friend will be glad to learn that the name of Chief Justice Cockburn appears in that majority of 84 which sanctioned the continuance of this tax. My hon. friend has said, that if I assure him there is no available surplus which can properly and safely be applied to the purpose which he has in view, he will not force on his proposal in the shape of a bill. Giving credit to my hon. and learned friend for the candour and moderation which distinguished his speech, I must say that I have objected, and always will object, as opposed to the true interests of the country, and as detracting from the character and dignity of this House, to all attempts to pledge the future by abstract resolutions. My hon. friend has employed the old stock argument about no time, either before, after, or during the budget, being the proper time for bringing forward a financial proposal. That would be an excellent argument if it were true. The time to bring forward any proposal is when the House has all the other proposals before it; it can then either adopt the plans of the Minister, if it deems them best, or substitute any other for them. But it cannot be regarded as a practical course, to bring forward a single proposition, pledging the House to a certain line of conduct, in order that credit may be gained with a portion of our constituents, being utterly uncertain whether it may ever be in our power to redeem that pledge. We have no right to suppose that because we began one year with a small surplus, and ended it with a large one, such will always be the case; and there is nothing in the circumstances of the present year that should warrant us in departing from the general rules of prudence that govern our action. With regard to the general argument, I am no great admirer of these taxes: but, in considering taxes as they affect a particular class, it is a fact of the greatest importance that they have been paid for several generations. This, in the end involves no hardship, for the trade or profession adapts itself to the burthens it has to sustain, and the amount of remuneration bears a proportion to those charges. I am sensible that there is something invidious in the nature of this tax, but I deny that a case has been made out to distinguish it from all other annual duties payable by professions. How can you say that it is right to tax trades, and that it is wrong to tax professions? Is there anything in the trade of an auctioneer that ought to be discouraged by this House? Why should the trade of a pawnbroker be taxed? He is the man who minister to the first necessities, in the matter of money, of the lowest class of the population, and every farthing of what is drawn from the pawnbroker is taken from the pockets of the poor. We lay a tax of 48,000*l.* upon hawkers. The whole of this sum comes from a trade which is pursued in minute details by men hardly one of whom is worth 100*l.* of capital in the world, and who drive their trade in the villages and among the peasantry of the country. There is nothing in the question of the permanent retention of this tax that is not fairly open to the consideration of the House; but not at the present moment, and under existing circumstances. If you want to give relief, the true way is to look first at the case of those heavy taxes on admission, which are a tax in favour of the rich and against the poor, inasmuch as they require an advance of capital from the youth to the State before he is allowed to carry on his business. That is a question which, if my hon. friend ever proposes to deal with by a bill, I shall feel it my duty to raise and argue at length.

Mr. Craufurd said that the House ought to know the circumstances under which the majority on the last division was obtained. There were two proposals for reduction of taxes before the House—the abolition of advertisement duty and of the duties now under discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House that the Government could not afford to part with the money from both. The House gave the preference to the abolition of the advertisement duty, and he (Mr. Craufurd) having been somewhat active in promoting the repeal of the advertisement duty, and having obtained what the right hon. gentleman called a “snap division” in its favour, voted on that occasion against the repeal of the annual duty paid by attorneys.

The House then divided—

THE LAWS AFFECTING RAILWAYS, BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME.

Now ready, in one thick vol. royal 8vo., price 11s. cloth boards.

SIR W. HODGES'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW of RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.

"The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

LONDON, JUNE 3, 1865.

THE READERSHIP ON LEGAL HISTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

THERE is an article in the Saturday Review on this subject, which suggests some observations upon it. The drift of that article is, in short, the abolition of the readership, and, indeed, of all the readerships, as they now exist. The ground upon which this is put is rather narrow—that they involve, as they now stand, the duty of tuition, and that it does not suit the writer of the article to attend to tuition, while it would suit him to deliver occasionally some lectures. Though, indeed, why lectures should be retained is hard to see; since the writer urges, that lectures, at all events, as now delivered, contain nothing which might not as well be read. So that while tuition he thinks “gossip,” he considers lectures of no particular advantage. He can see no advantage in oral distinction in any way, and, hence, he is more consistent in suggesting the total abolition of the readerships as they exist, than in recommending mere occasional lectures as the substitute. He is, indeed, utterly illogical and inconclusive; he sneers at the tuition portion of the duties of the readerships as a bad imitation “of college tuition;” leaving it uncertain whether he considers the fault is that it is a bad imitation of it, or that it is an imitation of it at all; whether college tuition is a bad thing, or whether tuition at Inns of Court is bad, because it is like it, or because it is not like it. On the whole, however, he appears to be rather against it, at all events, as applied to legal history and constitutional law, though why it should be bad on those subjects he does not explain; and, as already mentioned, he desires to abolish the readerships altogether as they now exist, that is, with tuition. The only reason he gives applies as well to all as to any; to college tuition as to that of Inns of Court; for it is, that is not easy or not possible to teach grown up men in that way. As the youth who enter at Inns of Court may be as young as many who enter at colleges, and few can be much older, one does not see the force of this; and as, of all the subjects that could possibly be suggested, those of legal history and constitutional law are precisely those best fitted for tuition, as being least dry and most susceptible of interesting illustration, it is impossible to feel the force of any peculiar objection to tuition on those subjects, though one can well conceive in the mind of a person who imagines tuition to be gossip, that it may appear of little value on any considerable subject. He thinks the readership, as it stands, is a mere “shelf,” and of little use as now discharged. He would lecture, he says, in a more “speculative manner;” and the better to provide for existing and speculative views, his idea is, that the readerships being abolished, as they now stand, gentlemen be invited from year to year to deliver a course of lectures on some favourite subject, without any tuition at all. The one great reason for this change is, that men in business cannot attend to tuition, while they can occasionally deliver a course of lectures. So that, by a constant succession of yearly appointments, most men at the bar in business will be able to deliver such a course of lectures on some subject or other.

Now, all this simply betrays an entire unacquaintance with the history of the office, and with the true nature and character of its functions and duties. And as this is itself a portion of “legal history,” it may be of some interest to elucidate it. It is notorious that the object of the establishment of the Council of Legal Education, and the great object of their efforts, has been to revive and restore in the Inns of Court their pristine functions of legal education. Nothing can be more clear than that, in their origin, they were simply legal colleges. Fortescue distinctly tell us so. “Wherefore, while the laws of England cannot be conveniently taught or studied in the universities, they are taught and learned in a certain place of public or common study, more apt for attaining unto a knowledge of them than any other university; . . . and where the laws are read and taught as in common schools”—that is, as at the schools of the universities. (De Laudibus Legum, cap. 48). And it abundantly appears, that the “benchers,” as they are now called, or the “fellows,” as they were called of old, were really the fellows of a college, and were all tutors in their turn. There is clear record of the appointment of readers ever since the time of Edward IV. (Vide Dugdale's Orig. 243-249). What manner of office that of the reader was, and how it was discharged, may be gathered from that and other works, and from the records of mootings or readings; and it is manifest that the functions of readers were just those of college tutors and professors. They lectured and gave readings, and also had oral discussions with the students, or “mootings,” as they were called, in which moot points were discussed. Dugdale gives an ordinance, by which each member was bound to be present at the readings. The discussion of moot points is often mentioned. As regards the more formal readings or lectures, what they were may be seen from that fine specimen, Callis's Reading on the Statute of Sewers, which is a perfect mine of legal learning on its subject—the fruits and result, as he himself tells us, of twenty years' labour while at the bar. It is replete with erudition; a masterly exposition of the whole law and legal history of the subject; abounding with apt and accurate references to authorities, and shewing an intimate acquaintance with all the sources of our law and legal history from the earliest times. Callis himself tells us that this was the fruit of twenty years' labour; and one can well believe that not less than that period would suffice to attain such prodigious learning, and such consummate mastery of the law. Such were the manner of men selected for the office of reader, and such were their readings or lectures. These were not speculative men; their tuition was not likely to be gossip. Neither were they likely to be men of much forensic business or practice. Whatever practice they had was probably more as chamber counsel; the busy life of the bar would hardly leave them much time for the requisite study and research. Indeed, as a fact, the names of the most eminent readers are unknown at the bar. One may look in vain through the Reports for the name of Callis. So of Marrow, whose reading on the Office of Justice of the Peace he so highly eulogises, who has ever met with his name? The truth is, that the forensic character is not only not at all like the academic, didactic, or scholastic, but it is utterly opposed to it; and it is manifest, that as few men gain great success at the bar who are not specially gifted for it, and their order of gifts indisposes them to academic habits or aptitudes, they would be unfitted to be tutors, and so unlikely to be readers. The readers were essentially tutors and professors. They were not even in business at the bar as advocates. That is a business which expressly engrosses a man's energies when once he gets into it, and at once requires and fosters habits and aptitudes the reverse of academic, and likely to breed a distaste for tutorial duties. Thus it is that so few, if any, of the readers are known to fame, or are known even to have achieved forensic reputation. Our ancestors had not the narrow notion which restricts all excellence and ability in the profession to the forensic field. They knew that men who had no ability as advocates might have great talents for tuition, and that a bad orator might be a first-rate tutor, reader, or lecturer. Hence they provided a field and a career for such men, and made good use of them for legal education, and thus secured the full value of their abilities and learning in training the youth of the profession. And while the Inns of Court retained the ancient constitution, their functions were thoroughly educational, and the office of benchers or fellow was strictly professional and tutorial. The term "bencher," it is believed, is comparatively modern; the ancient word was "governor;" and the rulers of the Inns of Court were not necessarily or usually men in much business at the bar; they were rather the heads of legal and academical societies. Hence they were all suited for the office of tutors or professors, and took it in turns. Callis speaks of taking his turn, and tells us that it was more than twenty years before his turn came. The whole of that period was devoted to legal study; learning not only in chambers, but in courts; for men might learn in courts who did not practise there, at all events, who did not practise in a forensic sense. There were law reporters, for instance, who achieved eminence and reputation as such, although little known as advocates. In short, the profession of the law had its various walks or fields meted out to men of diverse abilities, or gifts, or aptitudes. One man had a gift for advocacy, another for counsel, a third for reporting, a fourth for tuition. Our ancestors wisely made use of them all, and gave to each a career. If the labours of each were useful to the profession, each in his measure was entitled to reward, and had it; and those who had great success as advocates were not deemed to monopolise all the merit of the profession; on the contrary, as their labours were mostly for themselves, and had their own reward, in wealth and professional advancement, the men who most attained to this success were often anxious to enhance it by some services to the profession in treatises or reports. Thus it was with men like Coke, and Hobart, and Croke. Men like this, however, who had great success as advocates, could not work for the profession until their time of leisure and retirement came. It was at the end of their lives they set pen to paper, and put forth learned works; and having worked all their lifetime for themselves, they at the end laboured a little for the profession, or a future age. In the meantime, what would become of the profession but for others, who worked hard all their lives as reporters or readers, and legal tutors and professors? Thus it was with many unknown to fame, of whom the names of but a few survive, and of such was Callis. Thus it was more or less with all the benchers of our Inns of Court until the time came when, by the creation of Queen's counsel, about the time of Elizabeth, the constitution of the Inns of Court was changed. The Queen's counsel became the benchers, and being all men of large practice, they ceased to be readers. They had not the time, nor perhaps the aptitude for tuition. They had no taste for learned "readings" or "mootings." They were engrossed by their contests and triumphs in court. Then came an age of revolution, and organic changes in the State; and in the tumult many old legal institutions became obsolete; as, for example, official reporters and readers. Benchers were, it is true, named as "readers," but only as an honorary distinction. The benchers for the most part had become men in large forensic practice, and had no time or taste for tuition. The forensic spirit is not akin to the didactic or academic, and readerships became mere forms and names. The result was, that legal education declined. Declined, as classical or mathematical education would have declined, had there ceased to be colleges, and tutors, and professors at our universities. Declined, for the same reasons and from the same causes; and, of course, the remedy could only be the restoration of those elements in our legal institutions, the decay of which had caused this decline—that is, the elements of legal education; in other words, the tutorial and professorial elements. In a word, it was necessary to make the Inns of Court, once more, as much as possible what they originally were, i. e. legal colleges; and, with that view, to revive the readerships as they originally were, that is, as professorships and tutorships. It was necessary to re-establish them as nearly as possible as they originally existed—that is, to have men to fill them as nearly as might be of the same class or order. Sound lawyers and good tutors, men who could give "readings" or "lectures" like those which were given of old; and hold mootings for oral discussion. But to do this, it would not do to have benchers as readers in rotation, for they belonged to a different order. They were men of forensic practice, not at all of the academical order. For the same reason, it would not do to have barristers in forensic practice, for, indeed, they could not be had permanently; and the idea of a casual, occasional, or temporary "reader" is absurd. Such a system never existed, and never could have existed. It is true, the readers were chosen every year, but from a body who were all fellows and tutors; at all events, from a body all fellows, and fitted to be tutors, and merely becoming actual tutors in their turn—a body essentially academical and tutorial. The idea of a casual selection from a body of practising barristers, all absorbed in forensic practice, and filled with forensic ideas, was one too absurd ever to have occurred to our ancestors; and it is strange that any one at all acquainted with legal history should have suggested it. And certainly it did not occur to the Council of Legal Education, or, if it did, they very wisely discarded it; and they re-established the readerships as much as possible on their ancient footing, making only those alterations uniform which the altered times and circumstances, and especially the altered constitution of the bench, required—that is, they sought to secure as far as they could the services of the same order of men, to be rendered as much as possible by the exercise of similar functions—that is, educational functions. In short, the readerships were to be professorial and tutorial; and as the bench of an Inn of Court was no longer a body from which readers could practically be chosen, they established an office of reader on each of the great heads of legal study; and just as the reader of old used to select some subject of which he was master, so the Inns of Court select men as permanent readers on those heads of legal study over which they are supposed to have a mastery. It is obvious that the spirit and scope of the ancient institution are thus really revived and preserved, and the same result is attained. But it is also obvious that the permanence of the readerships, and their professorial and tutorial elements, are of their very essence—their permanence, for otherwise it would be useless to expect men of the proper order; and there would only be the leisure hours and spare energies of men in forensic practice, who, as already shewn, would most likely have no tutorial aptitudes. Nor, without permanence, would the office have that dignity, or importance, or status, which would open up a career, or hold out a reward for the life of labour required to qualify for it. Twenty years were deemed in the time of Fortescue not too long to devote to the attainment of an adequate knowledge of the common law, even at that time when its compass was but small; and we have seen that a single reading of Callis embodied the fruits of twenty years' labour and researches. And it is notorious that it is vain to expect, without many many years of study, a perfect mastery of any great field of knowledge.

Who is likely to undergo all these labours for the sake of delivering a casual course of lectures? Or, if he has undergone them, who will care to dedicate them to the profession in so inefficient and inadequate a mode? What are a mere isolated course of lectures? What are a succession of such isolated courses by different men, casually chosen? What are they likely to be? Will they be anything at the best but the means of ventilating vague and speculative views? Will they be replete with rich and varied learning? And even if they are, will they work much effect, apart from any system of study and tuition?

Will they do more at the utmost, than merely stimulate interest on some subjects? Will they do much, if anything, to enrich, to inform, to instruct, or to guide the legal students? What would our universities be with mere indiscriminate lecturing—without any course of study—any system of instruction—any tuition—any intercourse between the minds of the teacher and the taught? The very essence of the office of reader is tutorial and educational, and to eliminate from it those elements is really to destroy its efficiency; mere lecturing, apart from long study and systematic tuition, would degenerate into vague and fruitless declamation. Can any analogy be drawn between the office of reader to the Inns of Court and the lectures delivered by young men to articulated clerks, on the mere ordinary routine matters of the profession? The very name of Callis shews how far removed from this, and from the popular idea of lecturer, was the ancient type of the reader, which has been now revived. It is an office which requires deep acquaintance with the sources of our law and legal history, and accurate attention to facts and documents, and constant and careful reference to authority. All this requires years of research, and habits of research, not likely to have been acquired by men in business at the bar, constantly and casually selected. This is, above all, the case with the readership on legal history and constitutional law. In this, above all others, it is necessary to have a mastery of the documents and records of our constitution, and the sources of our legal history; our ancient Anglo-Saxon law, and our old Saxon and Norman chronicles; our old law writers—Bracton and Britton, Fleta and Glanville; our Year Books, and Books of Assize, and Books of Entries, and all our law reports, ancient and modern; our Statute Book from the earliest time to the present; the course and progress of law legislation; our works of legal or constitutional history—Hale or Selden, or Reeve or Hallam. How many men immersed in actual practice at the bar are likely to be masters of all these fields of knowledge? How many have written works on any branch of legal history, or any work shewing any great acquaintance with its sources and authorities?

It is to be observed, that this is a readership on legal history and on constitutional law. It is essentially a legal readership, as, indeed, all the readerships properly are; for the Inns of Court are seminaries of law—not of general literature or education. It is not a readership on history, nor even on constitutional history, nor on jurisprudence; it is a readership on legal history and constitutional law. No one is qualified for it who has not a complete mastery over the legal muniments and documents of our constitution, and the sources and authorities of our legal history. And what are they? We have described them. They are, in a word, legal records and reports. They are the statutes and charters of the realm, and the acts of our courts. Not only does it require a life of legal education to have a mastery of these, but it requires also a legal mind to rightly apprehend and expound them. And, more than all this, it requires a mind, on the one hand, enriched and informed by study and research; and, on the other hand, practically acquainted, by presence in our courts, with the working of all the various institutions and jurisdictions which make up what is called our constitution, and which these courts exercise, administer, and control. No mere student could make a good reader on such a subject. He must have sat many years in the courts, as well as in his chambers. His knowledge must have been acquired in the tribunals as well as in the libraries of the law. He must have seen how all our institutions work; at all events, so far as their working is disclosed or controlled in courts of law, and so far as they are exhibited in their legal aspect—political institutions (as, the revision of the parliamentary registers), in one court; fiscal institutions in another court; judicial or municipal institutions in another court; eleemosynary institutions in another court. It would be a fallacy to suppose, as many persons do, that our constitution is only political. It has a far wider range and scope—so vast, indeed, that, the mind of no person would be enabled to embrace the whole, unless thus enlarged and expanded by constant presence for a long course of years in our courts, including, if possible, the “high court of Parliament.” Only thus, and not by sitting in the closet or studying in the library, can the vast range of our constitution be appreciated. And in addition to all this, there must be the gift of exposition and explanation; aptitude of illustration; capacity to make a legal subject interesting; the power of arresting attention, and fixing it; the faculty of stimulating the mind to exertion; fluency and fervency of speech; a ready flow of ideas; facility of composition and expression; in short, all the varied gifts of a good tutor and a good professor. But the basis of all is a fund of learning on the particular subject, not likely to be acquired except by twenty years’ study, and not likely to be of any use without twenty years’ exercise of mind, and pen and speech upon it. All these together make a good legal tutor and professor, and such should our readers be. If any are not so, the more the pity, and the more reason that in future they should be so. In the hands of an able man who had the requisite learning and abilities, the office would not be useless; it would be of inestimable value. It would not be sought by such a man, by any man of spirit, as a “shelf,” but as a high and glorious career, as opening a noble field of generous and laborious usefulness; as deserving, and indeed demanding, the highest exercise of his best and noblest faculties; as affording at once an adequate employment, and appropriate reward, for the studies and labours of long years, as well worthy of the utmost energy and the greatest zeal. It would be impossible to imagine a nobler motive, or a more powerful stimulant to continued energy and exertion, than being constantly called upon to meet a body of educated young men to expound to them some great theme, and discourse to and discuss with them upon it. It must have a tendency to incite the reader to continued exercise of his intellect and powers of thought, and it must constantly incite him to fresh exertions and researches, in order to sustain his resources; it must expose him to constant inquiries from intelligent pupils, which must test the possession of real knowledge of his subject; and by this constant contact of his mind with theirs, he must be enabled to see how far they follow him, and rightly apprehend and retain his instruction; while they, on the other hand, are able to make sure that they understand him. Thus the readings or lectures form the basis of discussion, and the discussions correct and apply the lectures. Thus the readers and the hearers go together through a sustained and continuous course of study, and the mutual action of their minds elicit from it all the advantage that can be derived from it, and stimulate to the utmost the exercise of thought upon it.

It is conceived, therefore, that the Council of Legal Education did well and wisely to restore the ancient office of reader, and that its essence is tutorial, so that the proposal to eliminate from it the tutorial or educational element is simply not only to abolish it, but to give up the whole plan of legal education altogether. This, indeed, would be a sad mistake, and the idea of substituting for it temporary and casual lectures is most unfortunate. For the ancient and honourable office of reader, a man of learning and ability may well feel an ambition; for the temporary office of stipendiary lecturer, he will feel very little desire. The one is an office of high legal scholarship, and deep learning, and careful tuition; the other is likely to lead only to vague declamation and visionary speculation.

TO THE EDITOR OF “THE JURIST.”

STAMP DUTIES ON TRANSFERS OF MORTGAGES AND CHUSES IN ACTION.

SIR,—The stamp duty on a transfer of mortgage for any sum exceeding 1400*l.* is 1*l.* 15*s.* if no further sum is advanced, but where there is a further advance (say of 50*l.* to pay the expense of the transfer), the duty is not, as would be expected, 1*l.* 15*s.*, plus 1*s.* 3*d.*, the duty on the 50*l.*, but 1*s.* 3*d.* only. To remove this anomaly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday (as I observe in the newspaper), proposed to the House a resolution, the effect of which is, to impose a duty of 6*d.* per cent. on transfers of mortgages, with or without further advances, and a further duty of 2*s.* 6*d.* per cent. on the further advance. By this means transfers up to 1400*l.*, which now pay the same duty as original mortgages, will be relieved from a 2*s.* 6*d.* per cent., and subjected to a 6*d.* duty. Transfers exceeding 1400*l.*, and not exceeding 7000*l.*, which are now subject to a uniform duty of 1*l.* 15*s.*, will bear a 6*d.* duty, not exceeding 1*l.* 15*s.*; and transfers exceeding 7000*l.* will be subjected to additional ad valorem duty at 6*d.* per cent. beyond that sum.

The resolution does not, however, deal with the duties on transfers of bonds or warrants of attorney, which are in pari delicto, and which it would seem would remain subject to the same anomaly; nor with transfers of other choses in action, the duties on which, I venture to say, are not in a satisfactory state.

For instance, the duties on the transfer of a bond and warrant of attorney by the same instrument are separate, though both instruments may be given to secure the same sum. If judgment be entered up on the warrant, or recovered on the bond, the duty on the transfer of the security will be 10s. per cent. ad valorem duty, as upon an assignment on a purchase, and not as on a transfer; but if judgment be recovered on a covenant in a mortgage deed, and the mortgage and judgment be transferred, no additional duty will be payable on the transfer of the judgment. If a covenant, other than in a mortgage deed, be transferred, the duty will be 10s. per cent. ad valorem, though that on the original covenant is but 2s. 6d. per cent.; and there is this further peculiarity about the 2s. 6d. per cent. duty on a covenant, that it is only payable when it would exceed 1l. 15s. Again: the duty on a transfer of a simple contract debt is 10s. per cent., and not 2s. 6d. per cent. Thus, it will be seen that judgments, covenants, and simple contract debts are not subject to transfer duties, properly so called, and that bonds and warrants of attorney, though subject to transfer duties, cease to be so subject when judgments are recovered upon them.

The matter, I admit, is not without difficulty, owing to the comprehensiveness of such terms as debts and choses in action; but at present the difficulty is resolved by throwing the heaviest duty on the most doubtful and least valuable properties. No intelligible reason can be given for a difference of duty on transfers of mortgages, judgments, warrants of attorney, covenants, bonds, and simple contract debts; and in order to assimilate the duties, only a little care is required in the selection of apt language and the introduction of proper exceptions.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
FRANCIS PEACHEY.

THE JURIDICAL SOCIETY OF BERLIN.

[We have received the following intimation through the Jurisprudence Department of the Social Science Association.]

The Juridical Society, at a meeting held this day, passed a resolution to offer a premium for essays on the following subject:—

"Is personal arrest admissible, as a means of execution in civil proceedings?"—and to lay down the following rules for the competition:—

1. It is required that this question of legislation be treated historically and dogmatically from the points of view of jurisprudence and political economy, with a comparative analysis of the laws in force on this subject among the various peoples governed by German and Roman law, more especially Germany, England, France, and the United States of North America.

2. The essays must be delivered in duplicate before the 1st March, 1866, to the secretary of the Juridical Society (Councillor of Justice Meyen, No. 65, Leipzigerstrasse, Berlin); they must be provided with a motto, and the name of the author added, in a sealed paper bearing the same motto.

3. Five members of this society, two of whom must belong to the legal faculty of the Berlin University, will be elected as umpires by the written votes of the members present at the meeting in March, 1866.

4. The umpires' award and the names of the premiated essay, will be announced at the meeting held in June or September, 1866.

5. The premium for the best work is fixed at fifty fredericksdor (42l. 10s.), which will be paid over as soon as the name of the author of the premiated work is announced.

6. The premiated essay becomes the property of the Juridical Society. The author, however, retains the right of publishing it before the 1st September, 1867; and for this purpose is entitled to the copyright of the premiated essay.

COUNT WARTENSLEBEN,
President of the Juridical Society.

RECORD OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

The Attorney-General moved the second reading of this bill. Its object was to complete the benefits derived in Ireland from the system of parliamentary titles provided by the legislation of late years. Under the Incumbered Estates Act property to an enormous value—not less than 23,000,000*l.*—had been cleared, and sent into the market with an unimpeachable parliamentary title. Since the passing of that act the Legislature had given to the Landed Estates Court in Ireland power to make a declaration of title, which should be a clear parliamentary title, to any owner of land in fee-simple, and the beneficial effects of that legislation could hardly be overrated. That legislation was imperfect, since there was no provision for continuing, as to future transactions, the parliamentary title once created, and for preventing the land from relapsing into its original condition of incumbrance. In 1862 acts were passed by Parliament for the purpose of simplifying the transfer of land in England, of enabling a parliamentary title to be acquired by means of the registration office, and of perpetuating it by keeping a subsequent record of all after transactions. The scheme was not compulsory, but permissive, and there was a drawback, which the good sense of the country was overcoming, against its efficient operation, arising out of the indisposition of solicitors and attorneys throughout the country to co-operate in carrying out a change of law which interfered with an important branch of business they had been in the habit of conducting, no doubt, with great ability, and perhaps with some profit. Under these circumstances prophecies were indulged in that the scheme would have no effect, and that nobody would take advantage of it. Consequently it was not all at once that the public began to discover that they really had the means of acquiring clear titles to their estates, and of keeping their titles in a marketable condition; but now the public were becoming acquainted with the benefits of the measure, for whereas from October, 1862, to March, 1864, there were only 65 applications for registration, comprising about 5000 acres of land; from March, 1864, to April, 1865, there had been 216 applications; and it might be concluded that that rate of increase would be progressive. At rather an earlier period the same system was tried in South Australia: and here he must not omit to mention the name of Mr. Torrens, on account of the zeal and ability with which he had promoted the cause of public improvement on this subject. In 1864 an association, with the Duke of Leinster at its head, was formed in Dublin for the purpose of obtaining this necessary supplement to the measure, which had been in successful operation in Ireland; and it was partly by the labours of that association that the Government had been enabled to prepare the present bill. There existed in Ireland a general registry of deeds, but that did not enable persons to keep titles clear. Nevertheless, as the present bill was only permissive, those who liked the other system might still use it, have incumbered or uncertain titles, and be unable to deal with their property without running up a very heavy bill with their solicitors. It was provided by the present bill that in all cases in which a parliamentary title was created, that title, if the parties so wished, would at once be placed on the record, together with all subsequent dealings, transfers, &c.; and the record of title was all the public would have to look to. The bill proposed to enlarge in one or two respects the powers of the Landed Estates Court. At present that Court only had power to make a declaration of title in the case of estates in fee-simple, but that power was now proposed to be extended to all estates. In Ireland many leases were virtually perpetual, and there was to be a power for having separate records of these estates on the register. All that was to be done without throwing any new expense on the country. The necessary fees upon the business done would be relied upon to meet any outlay. There were some provisions for recording devises by will, and the succession of heirs in case of intestacy by certain steps to be taken for establishing the title on these different occasions. From the Landed Estates Court appeals would be given to the Court of Chancery in Ireland and the House of Lords.

Mr. Whitelaw opposed the bill; it did not provide that the Consolidated Fund should make good all the losses which must necessarily arise from it to the owners of property in Ireland. If such a provision was essential in Australia, as Mr. Torrens informed them, how could it well be dispensed with in Ireland? Under the general registry of estates in Ireland, if the registrar-general made a mistake in giving a certificate, he was liable for damages. There was no provision made in this bill to remedy any error that might be committed. Those to whom the prodigious powers of the bill were given were supposed to be infallible, and there was no remedy against judge, officer, or anybody. The 24th clause enacted, that "on the death of the recorded owner of any real estate, any person claiming as devisee may apply to the judge for a fiat, directing the officer to record the applicant as owner in the place of the deceased person." A person might go with a piece of paper to the judge, and say, "Record me as devisee." If the judge chose to do so, the person recorded as devisee might sell the estate next day, and there was no remedy against the purchaser. The will under which the devisee claimed might have been fraudulently obtained, or another will turned up; but the case had been summarily decided; the estate was gone for ever. But the judge might withhold his fiat "until the applicant shall have obtained an order, or decision, or certificate from her Majesty's Court of Probate in his favour, and shall have lodged in the office the probate or a true copy of the will or codicil under which he claims," &c. Those who framed this clause could have no accurate idea of the law that related to the Probate Court in Ireland. No power was given to the Probate Court to pronounce any opinion on the construction of the will. To refer the matter to him who had no authority to deal with it was an absurdity. He was lately engaged in a case where three wills were produced. Well, the devisee appeared, produced the will, and the estate was gone. The next clause enacted, "On the death of the recorded owner of real estate, any person claiming as heir-at-law may apply to the judge for a fiat, directing the officer to record the applicant. If there shall be any doubt, dispute, or litigation touching the ownership of the estate of a deceased owner, the Court may appoint a person to be recorded in his place as the representative of such estate," &c. It was one of the most critical things to find out who was heir-at-law. Whether there ought not to be a limitation of the time—five years according to some, or ten years according to others—within which, if a will were not produced, it should be concluded that none existed, he would not say; but this question was to be disposed of in no time at all. Once the person was recorded, he could sell the estate. This was a very alarming bill. It could not be acted upon. It was full of mischief to all the interests of society. In their anxiety to be rapid they would become unjust. Under these circumstances, the bill should be referred to a select committee. Lord St. Leonards had expressed a decided dissent from its principles.

Sir G. Bowyer concurred in the observations of the hon. member for Dublin University, and hoped that an opportunity would be afforded for further inquiry.

Sir H. Cairns said, the bill before it came to them had been perfectly well understood out of doors, because he never remembered a piece of law reform which had excited so much attention from men of all classes—landed proprietors and mercantile men—as this. They had seen what advantages had been secured by measures of this kind in our colonies, and with what facility it could be worked. The fact that the bill was merely permissive disposed of many of the objections to it. The objections to the bill emanated from those who wanted to conjure up terrors to defeat a bill which they imagined—he thought unwisely—would interfere with their own interests. To send the bill to a select committee would be to prevent it from passing during the present session, and he, therefore, hoped hon. members would decide upon considering it in a committee of the whole House.

Mr. Malins did not think there was the least analogy between the case of the transfer of land and that of the transfer of stock, or the transfer of a ship; though he had heard the present Lord Chancellor say he hoped to see the transfer of land made as simple as that of stock. Till they resolved that land should be transferred without any regard to equitable titles, they could never make its transfer a simple one. He did not offer any opposition to the bill. It was a recommendation to the measure that it was only permissive, and if the gentlemen of Ireland were anxious for it, let them have it; but let them not suppose that the bill would do away with all the difficulties connected with the transfer of land. On the contrary, he believed those difficulties would speedily become as complicated under this bill as they were under the present system, if not more so.

Mr. Cogan approved of the bill.

Mr. Longfield advocated the second reading of the bill, although he did not anticipate that much good would result from it.

Mr. Murphy disclaimed, on the part of the body of solicitors, any opposition to any measure properly calculated for the development of the landed interest of the country. He did not think that the present bill would afford much better provision than the laws of the country already provided; but as it was the wish of the country that it should be passed, he should support the second reading.

The bill was then read a second time.

COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of this bill,

Mr. Craufurd objected to the mode in which the county court judges had been treated. Their work had constantly been increased, and would receive still further additions by this bill. It was true that an addition to their salaries was proposed in the present measure, but it took the objectionable form of fees, instead of a fixed salary; and as the superannuation allowances for county court judges were determined on the amounts of their fixed salaries, there appeared to be, as far as he could see, no provision for any increase in their superannuations.

Sir F. Kelly said, this bill would effect a greater improvement in that branch of the administration of justice which more immediately concerned the labouring and many of the middle classes than any measure which had for a long time been brought before the House. At the same time he agreed with what had been said as to the insufficiency of the remuneration of county court judges, and he hoped that a sufficient interval would be allowed before the bill went into committee to enable the House to receive returns upon which might be framed amendments to the system of paying the county court judges an additional remuneration out of fees, which, as proposed by this bill, appeared to him to be the worst that the wit of man could have devised. If no other member proposed such amendments, he should himself give notice of them, and he therefore hoped that the House would not be asked to go into committee until after Whitsuntide.

Mr. Hibbert did not oppose the second reading of the bill, but objected to the 13th clause. As the clause was originally framed, the judges were not to receive additions which would raise their salaries to more than 1600*l.* a year, while, as it now stood, the additions were not to exceed 300*l.* a year; so that the salaries of those judges who now received 1500*l.* a year might be raised to 1800*l.* He also objected to the equal distribution of the fees among all the judges, so that the judge of an agricultural district, upon whom comparatively little extra labour might be imposed by this bill, would receive as great an addition to his salary as would the judge of one of the populous districts in Lancashire, upon whom it might impose a very large amount of extra work.

Mr. Malins entertained considerable fears as to its working, and gave doubts as to the expediency of having a number of small Courts of Chancery all over the country. It was most important that the county court judges should not be overloaded with work, because, if they were, the whole system would break down. At present they could only try actions at law up to 50*l.*, and why their jurisdiction in equity should be extended to 500*l.* he could not understand. There were two reasons for the existing limitations—one, that the courts were not of so high a character that they ought to decide questions of great importance, and the other, that it was necessary that they should deal only with such cases as could be easily and speedily disposed of. By this bill it was proposed to give them jurisdiction in all matters of foreclosure and redemption, enforcing liens or charges upon land, and bills for specific performance, without saying anything as to the pleadings to be adopted, or the modes of trial to be followed. These classes of cases, especially those for specific performance, were difficult and often lengthy, and he was afraid, that if they were to be tried in the county courts by judges who were often only a single day in one place, they might interfere with the arrangement of accounts and break down the whole system.

Mr. Ayrton was of opinion that, if the bill were to become law, it would be necessary to consider the position of the registrars of county courts, with the view of securing that they should possess some legal qualification. In answer to the argument of the hon. and learned member for Suffolk, who had laid it down as a doctrine to be universally adopted, that persons ought not to pay fees who had recourse to a court of justice, he would observe, that he entirely dissented from that view, and that when the county courts were first established, a pledge was given that the fees should be commensurate with the whole expense of those courts.

Sir F. Kelly said the hon. and learned gentleman had misunderstood him if he thought he objected to the imposition of fees. What he had stated on the subject was, that the scale of fees laid down in the bill was not one which ought to be adopted.

Mr. Whiteside wished to know whether any attempt would be made to establish a scale of fees, as had been suggested by Lord St. Leonards in another place, for cases of small value in the Court of Chancery.

The Attorney-General, in reply to the remarks which had been made by the hon. and learned member for Wallingford in reference to specific performance, said it must be borne in mind that the principle on which county courts were established at all was, that it was better to administer rough justice than none, and to have questions settled as far as possible without having the property involved eaten up. As to the regulations which should be laid down, he had no doubt that as many forms as were found to be necessary would be adopted. On the question of payment he might observe, that the principle of equality was that on which the bill proceeded, and that the representations made on the subject should receive the fullest consideration.

The bill was then read a second time.

The Railway Clauses Bill was read a second time.

The House went into committee on the Inns of Court Bill pro forma, amendments were made, and it was ordered to be recommitted.

The Ecclesiastical Leasing Act (1858) Amendment Bill and Publichouse Closing Act (1864) Amendment Bill were read a third time, and passed.

Tuesday, May 30.

On the motion of Colonel Wilson Patten, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Court of Referees on Private Bills.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. Maffatt, in rising to call attention to the report of the select committee on the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, and the existing state of the laws in regard to debtor and creditor, said, that on the former occasion on which this subject was before the House, when the discussion came to a somewhat untimely end, he shewed, by documents which were before the House, the existence of a state of things which fully warranted the complaints which were made on all sides. The state of things previous to the passing of the act of 1860 was bad enough, but he believed that there was no man who would not gladly return to it rather than maintain the existing law. In the three years previous to 1860 the number of bankruptcies was about 1200 a year, the debts proved were 5,100,000*l.*, and the moneys collected 1,300,000*l.*—a sum equivalent to about 5*s.* in the pound, but which, it was true, was diminished by official charges and by misappropriations, which were described by Sir R. Bethell when in the present Parliament he exposed the “scandal and abomination,” as he termed it, of the act then in force. Under the act now in force, the number of bankruptcies had risen from 1200 to nearly 7500 annually, and in from 5000 to 6000 of these cases the insolvents were allowed to escape without paying any dividend, and the cost of whitewashing them was paid by the State. The first point with creditors always was to avoid an appeal to the Bankruptcy Court; and this indisposition to resort to that court became an engine in the hands of the debtor for the dictation of the terms upon which he would compound his debts. The result was, that there had sprung into existence a system so tinged with fraud that it might fairly be termed a fraudulent system. When a man found it convenient to stop payment he placed his affairs in the hands of an accountant or solicitor, who prepared a circular, which he signed, informing his creditors of the circumstance, and referring them to these gentlemen for further particulars. Attorneys and accountants were generally honourable men, who would not knowingly make a false statement, but they took exactly what they found upon the insolvent's books, and from them prepared a statement which they laid before the creditors. It was impossible to get any creditor to investigate these accounts merely that he might obtain a large dividend for himself and sixty or seventy other creditors; and the consequence was, that the greatest facilities were afforded for fraudulent insolvencies. Last week insolvencies were announced in the public papers to the amount of 5,500,000*l.*, and of none of these would anything be heard again. They would commence with a promise to pay 10*s.* or 15*s.* in the pound, which would gradually dwindle down to 2*s.*, 3*s.*, or 4*s.* in the pound. The explanation of that was to be found in the existing state of the law. A committee of that House had inquired into the law, and had recommended the abolition of the machinery of the present bankruptcy system, and the substitution of a system somewhat similar to that which now existed in Scotland, placing the affairs of the insolvent very much in the hands of the creditors, and giving them a machinery by which the estate could be worked up without the delays that had resulted from the joint action of the official and creditors' assignees. It had also recommended the abolition of arrest for debt, and the curtailing of the facilities which insolvents now enjoyed for obtaining certificates. He desired to know whether the Government intended to adopt the recommendations of the committee, and to adopt measures for the remedy of a state of affairs which was injurious to mercantile interests, and discreditable to the Legislature of the country. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving, that, in the opinion of this House, the report of the select committee on the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 deserves the prompt and serious consideration of her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Ayrton, in seconding the motion, said that on a more favourable occasion he should have felt it his duty to present to the House, fully and completely, the resolutions at which the committee upon this subject had arrived; but as his hon. friend had now been almost as unfortunate in his selection of a night as he was when the matter was last before the House, he would confine himself to the statement, that the changes proposed by those resolutions were of so fundamental a character, and would so affect almost every section of the statute now in force, that it would be impossible to carry them into effect by any mere amending act, and that it would be necessary to give effect to the concluding resolution, and introduce an independent bill for the amendment and consolidation of the law. It could scarcely be expected that the Government would, during the short time which remained of the present session, pass any comprehensive measure on the subject; but he hoped the Attorney-General would be able to assure the House that it would receive their serious consideration, with a view to legislation when the new Parliament met. Meantime, he had great pleasure in seconding the motion of his hon. friend.

Mr. Bass thanked the hon. member for Honiton for the constancy which he had displayed in bringing the state of our bankruptcy law under the notice of the House. The question was one which was at the present moment of the greatest interest to the mercantile community. Of course it would be impossible to carry a bill with respect to it in the present session; but then the Lord Chancellor, who was as familiar with the subject as with his morning and evening prayers, might without the slightest effort produce a measure which might be laid on the table of the House before the dissolution, and considered by the country during the recess. He hoped, he might add, that the Attorney-General would, before the session came to a close, make some explanation to the House as to the principle on which, in his opinion, the Government ought to act in effecting any alteration in the existing bankruptcy system.

Mr. Beecroft believed that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House agreed that the present law of bankruptcy was most unsatisfactory. In the session of 1860 the Government introduced a comprehensive measure for the reform of the law of bankruptcy. Its principle met with general approval, but though opposed by no one it did not reach the Upper House. When the House met the year after, they were all disappointed when they found that the Consolidated Bill was abandoned, and a sort of patchwork Amendment Bill substituted for it. No course could be taken more likely to lead to confusion and difference of decision, and he heard from those engaged in the administration of it that the law was thrown into such a state of inextricable confusion, that some parts of it were really rendered very difficult of interpretation. A very strong feeling of dissatisfaction generally prevailed, and a thorough change in the entire system was loudly called for; the Leeds Chamber of Commerce was against any attempt merely to amend the law, or any change which would leave the winding up of insolvent estates in the hands of any court or body of officials whatever, and was as decidedly in favour of leaving such winding up in the hands of the creditors. No change would be satisfactory, or prevent further agitation of the question, which did not altogether take out of the hands of officials the winding up of bankrupt estates, and transfer it to the creditors themselves, as was the case in Scotland. In fact, what the Leeds Chamber of Commerce really wanted was, the insolvent in the court and the estate out of court.

The Attorney-General said, the Government would undoubtedly recognise the duty of taking into prompt and serious consideration the report of the select committee on the Bankruptcy Acts. The committee were quite agreed in the opinion that it was desirable no longer to attempt to patch up a system which had been found not to answer, but that there should be a serious endeavour made to revise, as far as possible, both its principle and its details, and to place them on such a footing as would afford some reasonable ground that we should understand the system on which we were going to proceed in future, and start with a favourable expectation of its success. The committee had recommended substantially that for which the hon. member for Leeds contended for, with regard to the taking the winding up of insolvent estates out of the hands of the Court, while they had also made the important recommendation that imprisonment for debt should be abolished, but that the discharge given to a bankrupt or insolvent debtor should not at once operate, except on the payment of a dividend of a certain amount. These were material alterations, and he mentioned them on the present occasion, not for the purpose of entering into a vindication of their merits, but in order that the attention of the public out of doors might be directed to their consideration. If Parliament were to do anything useful, as he hoped it would in a future session, it must proceed on the two grounds, of endeavouring to consolidate the whole law, and of securing the support of public opinion as to those important principles which it was proposed to introduce, for the first time, into the new system. It was indispensably necessary that the Government, in dealing with the subject, should be in the possession of the views of the mercantile community upon it, because it would be useless to endeavour to carry a measure which failed to commend itself to their approval. He trusted, therefore, that before the House met again after the recess the attention of mercantile men would be carefully directed to the report of the committee, and that there would be a very general expression of opinion upon the question.

Mr. Göschel was sure the House must have received the remarks which had fallen from the Attorney-General with great satisfaction. He felt convinced that the challenge which had been thrown out by the hon. and learned gentleman would be accepted by the mercantile community, and that the subject would be very generally discussed by the chambers of commerce throughout the country. There was not a dissentient voice as to the necessity of entirely recasting our present bankruptcy system by means of a sweeping change, which would altogether remove a state of things which was most disgraceful to our legislation.

The motion was then agreed to.

LUNACY LAW.

Mr. Neate rose to call the attention of the House to some defects in the law relating to lunatics, both with respect to the administration of that law and its provisions, and to move an address for copy of any returns now in possession of Government as to English subjects now in confinement in lunatic asylums abroad. The hon. gentleman said the subject was one which had very recently been prominently brought under public notice, in consequence of the case of Mary Ryan, who had been forcibly removed from this country. The hon. member was proceeding to suggest that persons connected with conventual establishments in this country would do well, instead of removing their insane to Belgium, to provide an asylum here, to which they might be removed, and which would be subject to the control of the authorised Board, when the House was counted out.

THE SHIPPING LAW MANUAL: a concise Treatise on the Law governing the Interests of Shipowners, Merchants, Masters, Seamen, and other Persons connected with British Ships. Together with the Acts of Parliament, Forms, and Precedents relating to the subject. Being especially intended for popular use in Seaport Towns. By W. T. GREENHOW, of the Middle Temple, Esq., Barrister at Law.

"The 'Shipping Law Manual,' by Mr. W. T. Greenhow, brings into a popular shape, and to the latest date, the entire body of legal regulations affecting the shipping trade of the country alike in relation to owners, merchants, masters, and seamen, and is especially adapted for ordinary use by all persons connected with the business of seaport towns."—Times, Jan. 31, 1863.

"The object of the author of this book is to popularise the Law of Merchant Shipping, and to compress within the compass of a single volume all that is necessary to be known by those directly interested in British navigation. It was no easy task to condense and arrange this mass of legislation, so as to make it intelligible to the general reader. But Mr. Greenhow has achieved it, and placed within reach of every one connected with shipping a valuable compendium of the law relating to that branch of industry."—Shipping and Mercantile Gazette.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 10, 1865.

THE complications arising out of the arrangement clauses in the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, seem to be endless, the curious results quite un contemplated, the inability of the Courts to deal with them so as to effect the ends of justice, simplicity of proceeding, and what may possibly have been the intention of the framers, laughable, if the matter were not so serious. The Courts confess themselves unable to understand the provisions of the act as to these deeds; their decisions, therefore, have had no uniformity; sometimes their reasonings in different cases have more or less trenched on, or been inconsistent with, each other; sometimes their decisions have been actually irreconcilable. A slight sketch of the most important features of this subject may be instructive.

Sect. 192 provides, that every instrument entered into between a debtor and his creditors, or a trustee for them, as to his debts and liabilities, his release therefrom, or the distribution, &c. of his estate, shall be as valid and effectual against his creditors as if they had executed, if the following conditions are observed—first, a majority of three-fourths in value of the creditors for above 10l. shall in writing assent; secondly, if trustees be appointed, they must execute it; thirdly, the execution must be attested by a solicitor; fourthly, within twenty-eight days of execution it must be left with the registrar; fifthly, a certain specified affidavit delivered with it; sixthly, an ad valorem stamp shall be affixed; and, seventhly, on execution, all property comprised in it shall be given to the trustees. As to the first, the Lords Justices decided in Ex parte Godden (1 De G., J., & S. 260), that the secured creditors were comprised, although it is obvious that they may very easily be got to assent, though the deed may be a disadvantageous one. In Ex parte Syer (1 De G., J., & S. 318), the Lord Chancellor said that secured creditors ranked for the amounts due, after deducting their securities. But the Court of Common Pleas, in Turquand v. Moss (33 L. J., C. P., 354), followed the Lords Justices. And debts, though disputed, must be taken into account. (Ex parte Middleton, 33 L. J., Bank., 36). As to the second, it has been held that there need not be trustees, in order to make the deed binding on non-executing creditors. (Dechurst v. Jones, 33 L. J., Ex., 294). As to the fourth, the Lord Chancellor in Re Skinner (34 L. J., Bank., 9), allowed a trust deed to be registered, under sect. 194, in accordance with the decision in Wishart v. Fowler (33 L. J., Q. B., 125), but expressed an opinion that the Court had no jurisdiction to extend the time given by this clause in sect. 192. It has been laid down in several cases, beginning with Ex parte Rawlings (32 L. J., Bank., 27), that no cessio bonorum is necessary. The common-law courts, early in this business, laid down that, in order to be valid, the conditions must be reasonable, and a lamentable array of cases, too long to mention, is devoted to the question, of whether particular deeds are reasonable or not. Again: several cases have decided, that in order to make even a valid deed pleadable in bar in an action, there must be a release, or a provision that it may be so pleadable; but this does not interfere with the law of tender, so that if there be a tender of the agreed composition, this will be the subject of a good plea. (Fessard v. Mugnier, 34 L. J., C. P., 125; Garrod v. Simpson, Id., Ex., 70).

Sect. 193 calls for no remark; it merely provides for the method of registration by the registrar.

Sect. 194 provides, that every agreement by which the debtor conveys any of his property for his creditors, or makes an arrangement for the distribution, &c. of his estate, or his release from liabilities, shall be registered within twenty-eight days after execution, or within such further time as the Bankruptcy Court in London may allow, or shall not be receivable in evidence.

"This section was introduced," says the Lord Chancellor, in Ex parte Morgan (32 L. J., Bank., 15), "with a double view, first, because it was apprehended that many deeds of composition might still be made which would not be brought under sect. 192, and which might have an injurious effect by reason of there being secret deeds of arrangement. The obligation was, therefore, imposed upon all persons executing such a deed of bringing it within twenty-eight days, and a penalty attached in case of default that it shall not be receivable in evidence. Another object was this, it was thought that many deeds of composition might not be perfected in the manner required by sect. 192 within twenty-eight days, yet the creditors might be willing to accede to it; therefore, power is given under sect. 194 to register a deed which did not comply with the requirements of sect. 192. These two forms of registration being very different, the consequences of one form do not attach to the other. The consequence of an observance in every respect of the terms of sect. 192 is, that the deed is binding on the minority who do not execute it. No such consequence attaches to registration under sect. 194."

This section applies to every deed purporting on its face to be such a deed as is mentioned by the section (Hodgson v. Wightman, 32 L. J., Exch., 147); and the leave of the Court may be given after the twenty-eight days have elapsed. (Wishart v. Fowler, 33 L. J., Q. B., 125).

Sects. 195 and 196 are unimportant, being merely as to stamps and certain indorsements.

But sect. 197 is as important as it is difficult thoroughly to understand. It provides, that after registration the debtor, creditors, and trustees, either parties to, assenting to, or bound by, the deed, shall, in all matters relating to the estate and effects of the debtor, be subject to the Court of Bankruptcy, and have the benefit of, and be liable to, the Act, just as if the debtor had been adjudged bankrupt, the creditors had proved, and the trustees become creditors' assignees; and the trustees and the creditors shall, as between themselves, and as between themselves and the debtor, and as against third parties, have the same powers, rights, and remedies with respect to the debtor, his estate and effects, and the collection and recovery of the same, as are preserved by the assignees and creditors with respect to the bankrupt or his acts, estate, and effects in bankruptcy; and, except otherwise provided by the deed, the Court shall decide all questions on it by the bankrupt law as far as possible, and have power to make orders, &c., as if the debtor were a bankrupt. This section "mainly relates to deeds under sect. 192" (per Lord Chancellor in Ex parte Morgan), but applies also to deeds under sect. 194. As far as the Bankruptcy Courts are concerned, this section seems to put the debtor, creditors, and trustees (if there be any), as between themselves and as against third parties, in the same position as if there had been a bankruptcy, except in so far as the deed provides otherwise (Hodgson v. Wightman); so that, for instance, a trustee or a creditor, bound by a deed under sect. 192, can examine the debtor. (Ex parte Alexander, 32 L. J., Bank., 55; Ex parte Brooks, 33 L. J., Bank., 41). The full effect of the section, however, even as respects proceedings in that court, is not very clear; for instance, the possibly different effects arising where there are trustees and where there are not, seem difficult to foresee; and it is utterly impossible to say with certainty what the effects as to third parties are, the words relating to them being simply "as against third persons." And as to the effect on actions at law in the absence of decisions, we can hardly venture on an opinion. The only case which has come under our notice is the case of Topping v. Keysell (33 L. J., C. P., 225). In that case there was a conveyance of the property to trustees; and the Court held that, as the peculiar circumstances of the case and frame of the deed shewed that it was intended that the trustees should have the same rights as in bankruptcy, there was a relation back, so as to entitle them to bring trover against a man claiming under a bill of sale previous to the deed. The Court, however, carefully restricted themselves to the particular case, and said that they refrained from giving any opinion as to the general effects of sect. 197; and it should be observed that the defendant was one of the creditors of the arranging debtor. What, therefore, will be the effects of this section in the different cases, of there being trustees, of there being none, of there being an assignment of property, of there being none, and of a defendant being a creditor, or not being so, is almost beyond speculation.

Sect. 198 provides, that after notice of the filing and registration of such a deed, no process against the debtor's person or property, except a "ne exeat regno," shall be available without leave of the Court; and a certificate shall be as available as a protection in bankruptcy. This section applies to deeds registered after as well as before execution (Baerselman v. Longlands, 34 L. J., Ex., 3); but it applies only to deeds under sect. 192 (per Lord Chancellor, Ex parte Morgan); and the deed must be a valid one (Uderton v. Jewell, 16 C. B., N. S., 142); and the Court to give leave has been decided to be the Court of Bankruptcy. Two curious points have lately been raised on this section—first, if the deed contains a release which the debtor might have pleaded in an action, how far does such neglect prevent him from availing himself of this section if execution be issued against him? secondly, if the sheriff be presented with a certificate by the debtor, and discharge him, but the deed be in fact invalid, is the sheriff liable for an escape? With respect to the first point, in Whitmore v. Wakerley (34 L. J., Ex., 83) such a debtor was arrested, and an application was made to the Court of Exchequer under this section, and the point being raised, that having neglected to plead a release contained in the deed, the debtor was not entitled now to have benefit of it, they discharged the rule; but in a later case, of Hartley v. Mace (not yet reported, in the Common Pleas), in which execution having been issued against the debtor's goods, and money paid into court under an interpleader, an application was made to the Court to pay it out to the execution creditor, and Whitmore v. Wakerley was cited, the Court said the report of that case was not clear on the point, but they construed it to mean, that the application was to set aside the execution, and, so distinguishing it, said the meaning of the section was, that the plaintiff might proceed up to execution, but he could not avail himself of it, that the execution was to stand, but if he or his goods were taken, he was entitled to the benefit of the section. As to the second point, the Court of Queen's Bench, in Lloyd v. Harrison (34 L. J., Q. B., 97), differed, and the majority decided that the sheriff was not liable. It is also worth consideration, what is the meaning of no process "in respect of any debt."

Sect. 149 provides, that the Court may stay a petition in bankruptcy after execution of a deed of arrangement, and when registered shall dismiss it.

And sect. 200 provides for the case of creditors being abroad, and allows the consent of the majority in England to suffice under certain conditions; on which section we will only observe, that it seems to make it necessary to have trustees.

A vast number of other cases have been decided on these sections, but the above are the most important for the purpose of shewing the general effect of these provisions; and we may conclude this slight sketch (slight from the small space we can afford) by referring our readers to the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, in Ex parte Morgan, for a terse and authoritative exposition of the subject, as far as it goes.

GENERAL ORDER OF THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY,

As to the Mode of Proceeding for the Proof of Debts.
Saturday, May 27, 1865.

THE Right Honourable RICHARD BARON WESTBURY, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, with the advice and consent of the Right Honourable Sir JOHN ROMILLY, Master of the Rolls, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir RICHARD TORIN KINDERSLEY, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir JOHN STUART, and the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, doth hereby, in pursuance and execution of the powers given by the stat. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, and the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, and of all other powers and authorities enabling him in that behalf, order and direct in manner following:—

1. Every advertisement for creditors affecting the estate of a deceased person, which shall be issued pursuant to any decree or order, shall direct every creditor, by a time to be thereby limited, to send to the executor or administrator of the deceased, or to such other party as the judge shall direct, or to his solicitor, to be named and described in such advertisement, the name and address of such creditor, and the full particulars of his claim, and a statement of his account, and the nature of the security (if any) held by him; and such advertisement shall be in the form numbered 1 in the second Schedule hereto, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require; and at the time of directing such advertisement a time shall be fixed for adjudicating on the claims.

2. No creditor need make any affidavit nor attend in support of his claim (except to produce his security), unless he is served with a notice requiring him so to do, as hereinafter provided.

3. Every creditor shall produce the security (if any) held by him, before the judge, at such time as shall be specified in the advertisement for that purpose, being the time appointed for adjudicating on the claims; and every creditor shall, if required by notice in writing, to be given by the executor or administrator of the deceased, or by such other party as the judge shall direct, produce all other deeds and documents necessary to substantiate his claim before the judge, at his chambers, at such time as shall be specified in such notice.

4. In case any creditor shall neglect or refuse to comply with the preceding rule numbered 3, he shall not be allowed any costs of proving his claim, unless the judge shall otherwise direct.

5. The executor or administrator of the deceased, or such other party as the judge shall direct, shall examine the claims sent in pursuant to the advertisement, and shall ascertain, so far as he is able, to which of such claims the estate of the deceased is justly liable; and he shall, at least seven clear days prior to the time appointed for adjudication, file an affidavit, to be made by such executor or administrator, or one of the executors or administrators, or such other party, either alone or jointly with his solicitor, or other competent person, or otherwise as the judge shall direct, verifying a list of the claims, the particulars of which have been sent in pursuant to the advertisement, and stating to which of such claims, or parts thereof respectively, the estate of the deceased is, in the opinion of the deponent, justly liable, and his belief that such claims, or parts thereof respectively, are justly due and proper to be allowed, and the reasons for such belief.

6. In case the judge shall think fit so to direct, the making of the affidavit referred to in the preceding rule numbered 5, shall be postponed till after the day appointed for adjudication, and shall then be subject to such directions as the judge may give.

7. At the time appointed for adjudicating upon the claims, or at any adjournment thereof, the judge may, in his discretion, allow any of the claims, or any part thereof respectively, without proof by the creditors, and direct such investigation of all or any of the claims not allowed, and require such further particulars, information, or evidence relating thereto, as he may think fit, and may, if he so think fit, require any creditor to attend and prove his claim, or any part thereof; and the adjudication on such claims as are not then allowed shall be adjourned to a time to be then fixed.

8. Notice shall be given by the executor or administrator, or such other party as the judge shall direct, to every creditor whose claim, or any part thereof, has been allowed without proof by the creditor, of such allowance, and to every such creditor as the judge shall direct, to attend and prove his claim, or such part thereof as is not allowed, by a time to be named in such notice, not being less than seven days after such notice, and to attend at a time to be therein named, being the time to which the adjudication thereon shall have been adjourned; and in case any creditor shall not comply with such notice, his claim, or such part thereof as aforesaid, shall be disallowed.

9. Any creditor who has not before sent in the particulars of his claim pursuant to the advertisement, may do so four clear days previous to any day to which the adjudication is adjourned.

10. After the time fixed by the advertisement, no claim shall be received (except as before provided in case of an adjournment), unless the judge shall think fit to give special leave upon application made by summons, and then upon such terms and conditions as to costs and otherwise as the judge shall direct.

11. The rules numbered 37, 38, 41, 42, and 43, of the 35th Consolidated General Order, are hereby abrogated, in so far only as the same relate to creditors.

12. Where any decree or order is made for payments by the Accountant-General to creditors, the party whose duty it is to prosecute such decree or order shall send to each such creditor, or his solicitor (if any), a notice that the cheques may be received from the Accountant-General; and such party shall, when required, produce such decree or order, and any other papers necessary to enable such creditors to receive their cheques and get them passed.

13. Every notice by this Order required to be given shall, unless the judge shall otherwise direct, be deemed sufficiently given and served if transmitted by the post, prepaid, to the creditor to be served, according to the address given by such creditor in the claim sent in by him pursuant to the advertisement, or, in case such creditor shall have employed a solicitor, to such solicitor, according to the address given by him.

14. Solicitors shall be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth and referred to in the first schedule to this Order, for business done under this Order.

15. The forms set forth or referred to in the second schedule to this Order, with such variations as the circumstances of each case shall require, shall be adopted for the respective purposes therein mentioned.

16. This Order shall come into operation on and after the 15th June, 1865; and the general interpretation clause in the Consolidated General Orders shall be deemed to extend to this Order; and the word "creditor" used in this Order, and in the forms subjoined hereto, shall include a person claiming any debt or liability affecting the personal estate of a deceased person, under any order made pursuant to the stat. 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

No. 1.—Advertisement for Creditors. [Rule 1.]

Pursuant to a decree [or, an order] of the High Court of Chancery, made in [the matter of the estate of A. B., and in] a cause, S. against P., the creditors of A. B., late of —, in the county of —, who died in or about the month of —, 18—, are, on or before the — day of —, 18—, to send, by post, prepaid, to E. F., of —, the solicitor of the defendant C. D., the executor [or, administrator] of the deceased [or as may be directed], their Christian and surnames, addresses and descriptions, the full particulars of their claims, a statement of their accounts, and the nature of the securities (if any) held by them; or, in default thereof, they will be peremptorily excluded from the benefit of the said decree [or, order]. Every creditor holding any security is to produce the same before the Master of the Rolls [or, Vice-Chancellor —], at his chambers, situated at &c., on the — day of —, 18—, at — o'clock in the — noon, being the time appointed for adjudicating on the claims.

Dated this — day of —, 18—. G. H., Chief Clerk.

No. 2.—Notice to Creditor to produce Documents.
[Rule 3.]
(Short Title.)

You are hereby required to produce, in support of the claim sent in by you against the estate of A. B., deceased [describe any probate, administration, deed, or document required], before the Master of the Rolls [or, Vice-Chancellor —], at his chambers, situate at &c., on the — day of —, 18—, at — o'clock in the — noon.

Dated this — day of —, 18—. G. B., of &c., solicitor for the plaintiff [or, defendant, or as may be.]

To Mr. S. T.

No. 3.—Affidavit of Executor or Administrator as to Claims. [Rule 5.]
In Chancery.
(Title.)

We, C. D., of &c., the above-named plaintiff [or, defendant, or as may be], the executor [or, administrator], of A. B., late of —, in the county of —, deceased, and E. F., of &c., solicitor, severally make oath, and say as follows:—

I, the said E. F., for myself, say as follows:—

1. I have, in the paper writing now produced and shewn to me, and marked A., set forth a list of all the claims the particulars of which have been sent in to me by persons claiming to be creditors of the said A. B., deceased, pursuant to the advertisement issued in that behalf, dated the — day of —, 18—.

And I, the said C. D., for myself, say as follows:—

2. I have examined the particulars of the several claims mentioned in the paper writing now produced and shewn to me, and marked A., and I have compared the same with the books, accounts, and documents of the said A. B. [or as may be, and state any other inquiries or investigations made], in order to ascertain, so far as I am able, to which of such claims the estate of the said A. B. is justly liable

3. From such examination [and state any other reasons], I am of opinion, and verily believe, that the estate of the said A. B. is justly liable to the amounts set forth in the sixth column of the first part of the said paper writing marked A.; and to the best of my knowledge and belief, such several amounts are justly due from the estate of the said A. B., and proper to be allowed to the respective claimants named in the said schedule.

4. I am of opinion that the estate of the said A. B. is not justly liable to the claims set forth in the second part of the said paper writing marked A., and that the same ought not to be allowed without proof by the respective claimants [or, I am not able to state whether the estate of the said A. B. is justly liable to the claims set forth in the second part of the said paper writing marked A., or whether such claims, or any parts thereof, are proper to be allowed without further evidence.]

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 1.

RECORD OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this bill, Mr. Whiteside hoped the Attorney-General would consent to postpone going into committee on so complicated a subject at that late hour (ten minutes past 12). He would suggest that all persons who had a parliamentary title should be allowed to renew that title every five years; and also that, instead of adding another system of registration to the two already existing in Ireland, there should be but one system, and that the entire business of registration should be conducted in one office.

Mr. Monseil hoped that the Attorney-General would not accede to the proposition of the right hon. gentleman opposite. Delay at that period of the session would be fatal to the bill, and he, therefore, trusted they would go into committee, and make some progress that night.

Mr. Scully also hoped that the right hon. member for Dublin University would withdraw his opposition to the measure and allow it to pass that session in spite of all its defects. For himself, as far as a register of title was concerned, he was in favour of the bill; but as far as a register of deeds was concerned he was against it.

The O'Conor Don expressed a hope that the Attorney-General would not consent to the proposal of the right hon. member for Dublin University.

The Attorney-General said that the bill was generally desired by the landed gentry of Ireland, and he thought it advisable that the House should now make whatever progress was possible with the measure.

After some observations from Mr. Murphy, Mr. Hassard said, there would be many difficulties in the way of carrying this bill into operation. Anything which it would effect could be done under the existing law; and if any change was to be made, it ought to be made by a comprehensive measure.

Sir H. Cairns observed, that the objections raised in the course of this discussion had much better be dealt with in committee.

Mr. George was of opinion that the bill was altogether illusory, and would not effect what its promoters seemed to expect from it.

Mr. Malins concurred in the opinion that the bill would be altogether illusory, but recommended that the House should be allowed to go into committee upon it.

The speaker left the chair, and the House went into committee.

The first five clauses of the bill were agreed to, with amendments, and the chairman was ordered to report progress.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING BILL.

The Attorney-General moved the House disagree with the amendment of the House of Lords to this bill. The House would be aware that it was proposed that the Treasury should contribute the sum of 300,000*l.* towards the erection of the new courts of justice, in consideration of the rents of certain buildings which would be placed at the disposal of the Government when those courts were finished. Among those buildings was the one in Southampton-buildings, formerly occupied by the Masters' offices, belonging to the Court of Chancery. That building had been erected out of the very fund from which the 1,000,000*l.* was to be taken towards building the new courts of justice, and he could not see why the House of Lords should object to the proposed arrangement.

The motion for disagreeing with the Lords' amendment was then agreed to.

COURTS OF JUSTICE CONCENTRATION (SITE) BILL.

On the consideration of the Lords' amendment to this bill, The Attorney-General said the House of Lords had prepared an amendment to this bill, to the effect that no land should be purchased for the erection of the new courts of justice until a determination had been come to relative to securing land to make proper approaches to that building. That was a subject for a new act of Parliament, and it ought not to be permitted to put a stop to the present bill. After consulting with those best acquainted with the subject, he proposed that the amendment of the Lords should be modified, so that no proceedings should be taken until a certificate in writing shall have been received by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, signed by the major part in number of the persons appointed by her Majesty, under the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865, to advise and concur with the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, with reference to the plan and arrangements of the buildings to be erected upon the lands hereby authorised to be taken, stating that they are satisfied that the lands to be acquired under this act, of which a plan has been laid before Parliament, are sufficient for all the purposes of the intended new courts and buildings connected therewith; and that the probable cost of the said lands and buildings will not exceed the amount of the funds provided under the Courts of Justice Building Act, 1865, for those purposes.

Mr. Selwyn thought the amendment of the House of Lords had introduced into the bill a wise precaution against the looseness of the estimate. The Treasury appeared to have abandoned their duty of guarding the public purse in this matter, and he hoped, therefore, either that the Attorney-General would not press the point at this late hour, or that the matter would be left as the House of Lords had put it.

Mr. Ayrton thought that the safeguard proposed by the Attorney-General was quite sufficient. To adopt the Lords' amendment would be a stultification of the Legislature.

Mr. Malins would have been more satisfied if the Attorney-General had wholly dissented from the Lords' amendment; but as he proposed a conciliatory course he would not object to it.

The Lords' amendment, as amended, on the motion of the Attorney-General, was agreed to.

The Inland Revenue Bill was read a second time.

The District Church Tithes Bill was read a second time.

The Trespass (Scotland) Bill was read a second time.

The Court of Chancery (Ireland) Nos. 2 and 3 Bills were withdrawn.

The order for the second reading of the Arrest for Debt Abolition (Ireland) Bill was discharged.

* The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 17, 1865.

LORD WESTBURY's bill to confer on the county courts a limited jurisdiction in equity, as it has been sent down to the Commons, after amendment in committee of the Upper House, would hardly be recognised by its framer. It no longer provides that the county courts shall have all the powers of the Court of Chancery, except certain powers, trusting to Providence for the sufficiency of the exception. It no longer, in a variety of matters, authorises proceedings to be commenced in any one of the fifty-nine county courts at the option of the person instituting them, without regard to the place of abode of any of the parties concerned, or the situation of the subject-matter. It no longer gives jurisdiction in discovery, in perpetuating testimony, in regulating the custody of infants, in taxing solicitors' bills, in granting injunctions in certain matters of contract, and in restraining infringements of patents or copyrights, without limit as to the magnitude or nature of the interests to be affected. It is, in short, very much less absurd and mischievous than it was in its original form. But it is still very absurd, and very mischievous.

In the original bill it was proposed, that in a suit for recovering money, the amount sought to be recovered should not exceed 100*l.*, or in case of a mortgage 300*l.*; or if the object were to distribute an estate or fund, the total amount or value should not exceed 500*l.*; or if title to or waste upon "lands, tenements, or hereditaments" were in question, the annual value should not exceed 20*l.*; but if the subject were partnership, the gross assets should not exceed 500*l.*; and if it were a contract of sale, the value of the property should not exceed 300*l.* This characteristic motley has been rejected by the committee, and the amended bill mentions no other limit in point of amount than 500*l.* It is now proposed to give to the county courts equitable jurisdiction in the following matters:—

1. In suits by creditors, legatees, devisees, heirs-at-law, and next of kin, in respect of an estate not exceeding in amount or value 500*l.*
2. In suits for the administration of a trust of an estate not exceeding, &c.
3. In suits for foreclosure or redemption of, or for enforcing a charge or lien on, property not exceeding, &c.
4. In suits for enforcing or setting aside a contract for the purchase of property not exceeding, &c.
5. In proceedings under the Trustee Acts or the Trustee Relief Acts, in respect of a trust estate or fund not exceeding, &c.
6. In proceedings relating to the maintenance or advancement of an infant whose property does not exceed, &c.
7. In suits for dissolution or winding up of a partnership, the whole property, stock, and credits of which shall not exceed, &c.
8. In proceedings for orders in the nature of injunctions for relief in any matter in which jurisdiction is given by the act.

When the county courts were first established to enforce legal demands of a simple nature, their jurisdiction was limited to cases in which the claim did not exceed 20*l.* The limit has since been extended to 50*l.* The theory on which the limitation was made, and by which the appointments of the judges have been regulated, is, that either on account of the probable simplicity of the claims, or of their comparative unimportance, it would not be necessary to engage the most learned and able men to preside over these courts. But it has hitherto been thought, and still appears to be thought, unsafe to entrust these judges with power to decide in simple legal claims exceeding 50*l.* That being so, and the judges being, with very few exceptions, men who never practised or even studied in equity, it is now proposed to retain the old limitation of 50*l.* in legal claims, which they may be presumed to understand, and to give them an entirely new jurisdiction to the extent of 500*l.* in equitable matters, which it is certain they do not understand, and which it is exceedingly improbable that they ever will understand, even after the lapse of that month of September, 1865, which the bill expressly gives up to them (sect. 20), we presume, for study. What sort of equity will grow up in fifty-nine county courts, not only unconnected by a common bar, but absolutely without any bar, and for the most part profoundly ignorant of the very elements of equity? The confusion of equity which our learned Chancellor so earnestly desires will quickly be realised within the limit of 500*l.*

No one deems it worth while to report the decisions of the county courts; nor would they be any more worth reporting if the jurisdiction were extended; nor, if reported, would or could any use be made of the reports. We should have, therefore, a host of little vice-chancellors administering equity throughout the kingdom, to the extent of 500*l.* per cause, each according to the measure of his own foot; so that no solicitor or counsel could advise any man as to his rights in any matter of equitable jurisdiction within the limit of 500*l.*

The existing staff of county court judges and their doings have not given such perfect satisfaction to the community as to justify any extension of their authority; and the great objection to the measure is one which equally applies to the county court system as it exists. Justice cannot be duly administered in small cases, except by judges who are frequently engaged in administering it in important cases, giving occasion for the discussion of legal principles and their application by able counsel, and subject to revision on appeal. Nothing but extreme poverty can excuse a State from providing a sufficient number of duly qualified judges for the despatch of all its judicial business. What is wanted is a provision for the gradual change of the present system into a general administration of law and equity throughout the country in all matters, whether of large or of small amount, by one staff of judges, with their officers, in adequate number, equal, in point of ability and experience, to the present judges and officers of the superior courts, and equally well paid. Of these judges a sufficient number should be appointed to sit in country districts, interchanging their districts, at intervals of six or twelve months, for others in the country or in town, so as to avoid as much as possible local influence and prejudice. In each district the judge or judges should take the whole of the civil business of the district, subject to regulations for the conduct of administrative business and the decision of matters of minor importance by officers of the court answering to the present masters of the common-law courts and chief clerks of the equity courts, and to a provision for separate sittings to hear cases not conducted by counsel; and every judge should in rotation sit in banco. The law and equity and practice of judges who are habitually confined to petty cases will fall to as low a level. But a court whose judges and officers are accustomed to the consideration and conduct of weighty matters, and who are constantly assisted, watched, and controlled by the most eminent practitioners in both branches of the profession, will maintain consistency and uniformity in the principles and administration of the law. In the meantime, if there is any pressing need for supplementing the existing jurisdiction of the equity courts in small matters (which we doubt), the plan might be adopted which was suggested in a former article, of establishing provincial branches of the Court of Chancery, to be administered, under central control, by competent clerks.

Reviews.

A Practical Treatise on the Succession Duty Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, with the Decisions thereon in England, Scotland, and Ireland. By WILLIAM BROWN, Esq., of Gray's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. 12mo., pp. 424. [Sweet.]

The Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), with the Decisions and Notes. By ALFRED HANSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. 8vo., pp. 188. [Stevens & Haynes.]

THESE are both good and carefully prepared guides to the construction and application of one of the most obscure acts of recent legislation. Mr. Brown's more systematic and elaborate work will probably be found the best aid to a patient study of the act; Mr. Hanson's the most convenient for reference in practice. Mr. Brown treats, in successive chapters, of the policy, frame, object, and interpretation of the statute; of its time of commencement, and retrospective operation; of successions; of predecessors and successors; of the duties; of the powers of trustees; of the practice and procedure in the inland revenue office, and on appeals; of costs; and of the rights and duties of vendor and purchaser in relation to succession duty—a subject not touched upon by Mr. Hanson. He also prints the act in a novel form (probably suggested by Mr. Coode's Analysis of an Enactment), exhibiting in separate paragraphs the component parts of each enactment, and distinguishing by a different type the leading words.

Mr. Hanson's work, which is in the form of a reprint of the act, with annotations, has the recommendation of being smaller, more recent by six months than its rival, and of being the fruit of considerable experience, the author having been engaged in most of the English cases as junior counsel for the Crown.

While Mr. Hanson is careful not merely to state with accuracy the circumstances of each case, but to bring out distinctly the reasoning or principle upon which the decision proceeded, he abstains entirely from criticism, and leaves his reader to form his own conclusion as to the soundness of the decision. There is little criticism in Mr. Brown's work; but as he undertakes the defence of the doctrine in Lovelace's case, Wallop's Trust, and Capeveille's case, which has been so much censured, we may infer, from his silence in regard to other cases, that he approves of them. Now, we think that in thus stating without comment many decisions, which, if not erroneous, have certainly not been generally approved of, both writers have mistaken their duty. In dealing with a subject like Lord Westbury's too famous "arrangement clauses"—equally muddled in conception and in expression—all that can be done is to ignore the enactments, and to hold by the decisions. But the Succession Duty Act, with all its faults, cannot be so treated. The design of it was clearly conceived, and has, on the whole, been consistently expressed. There are a few omissions; but the fault of the act is rather obscurity than incompleteness; while, so far as yet appears, it is free from inconsistency. If in applying such an act the Courts occasionally go wrong, and their decisions conflict with the principle and true interpretation of the enactments, the only possible result must be, that the erroneous decisions, as they can never be engrafted on the act, will sooner or later be overruled. It is the duty of a writer on the subject to forward the result by temperate criticism. We propose to devote our remaining space to an examination of the decisions in The Attorney-General v. Gardner (1 H. & C. 639; 9 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 281) and The Attorney-General v. Yelverton (7 H. & Norm. 306; 7 Jur., N.S., part 1, p. 1250), on which neither Mr. Hanson nor Mr. Brown makes any comment. The question in The Attorney-General v. Gardner arose under the marriage settlement of the Marchioness of Townshend, made in the year 1807, by which the lady's father, W. D. Gardner, settled a fund, upon trust for the husband and wife successively for life; then for the children; and in default of children, upon such trusts as the wife should appoint; and in default of appointment, for her absolutely. Under a provision in the settlement, the fund was sold, and an estate was purchased with the proceeds, and conveyed to corresponding uses. In 1808 the marchioness, by deed, appointed the estate, after the death of herself and her husband without issue, to such uses as her father, W. D. Gardner, should appoint; and in default of appointment, to him in fee. The father in 1831 made his will, devising the estate to the defendant (a stranger in blood) for his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and died shortly afterwards. The marchioness survived her husband, and died, without issue, in 1858. The Court decided that the defendant must pay succession duty at 10% per cent., as on a succession from his testator. The case turned upon the 2nd and 15th sections of the act. The 2nd section enacts, "that every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this act," and every devolution by law of a like interest, upon a like death, either in possession or in expectancy, "shall be deemed to have conferred, or to confer, on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution, a 'succession'; and the term 'successor,' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived." In the case under consideration it would not be easy to discover the predecessor by the light of the 2nd section alone. The original settlement, the appointment by the marchioness, and the will of W. D. Gardner, were equally dispositions by reason whereof the defendant became entitled; and the original settlor, the marchioness, and the testator (who was the same person as the original settlor), were equally persons from whom the interest of the succession was derived. If the subsequent section of the act had contained no gloss upon the general enactment in the 2nd section, it would have been reasonable to conclude, that as only one succession and one predecessor seem to be contemplated with reference to the same death, the intention was to point to the disposition which first created the interest expectant on death, and to the person as the predecessor who made that disposition. It would be consistent with that construction to hold, that if a remainder, expectant on the death of M., was limited by A. to B., and B., dying in M.'s lifetime, devised the remainder to C., there would be, under the act, two successions, and two predecessors—one on the death of M. from the predecessor A.; another on the death of B. from him as predecessor; and we should then have to look to the clause imposing the duty to see how those successions respectively were charged. Accordingly, it will be found that the view last suggested of the purport of the 2nd section is adopted in the 14th section, which provides, that "where the interest of any succession in any personal property shall, before he shall have become entitled thereto in possession, have passed, by reason of death, to any other successor or successors, then only one duty shall be paid in respect of such interest, and shall be due from the successor who shall first become entitled thereto in possession" [of course, if the clause had stopped here, at a rate according to the degree of his relationship to the person from whom he directly derived it; but the clause proceeds:—] "but such duty shall be at the highest rate which, if every such successor had been subject to duty, would have been payable by any one of them." This provision only applies to the transmission of a succession to personal property after the commencement of the act. No such provision is made for the case of real estate, because the duty on a succession to real estate is not charged on the gross value of the estate, but only on the present value of the income of the estate for the life of the taker from the time of his becoming entitled in possession; so that a successor to an estate in fee-simple, who lives four years and a half after he comes into possession, is not charged in respect of his power of disposing of the fee after his death, but only for the value of his life interest. If a reversion in fee is devised, no duty is payable by the devisee until the succession falls in. But if the reversion is devised on trust for sale, and is sold before it falls in, both succession duty and legacy duty will be payable; succession duty by the purchaser when he becomes entitled in possession; legacy duty by the legatee of the purchase money.

If the act gave no further explanation, it would still be doubtful who should in Gardner's case be regarded as the predecessor in respect of the succession to the real estate which fell in on the death of the marchioness, such succession being derived from the testator, from the marchioness, and from the settlor. The 15th section of the act was intended by the framer of the act to resolve such doubts:—"Where, at the time appointed for the commencement of this act, any reversionary property expectant on death shall be vested, by alienation or other derivative title, in any person other than the person who shall have been originally entitled thereto under any such disposition or devolution as is mentioned in the 2nd section of this act, then" the duty shall be at the rate which the original taker would have paid if he had continued to be the owner; and the same provision is made for the case of a succession becoming, after the commencement of the act, vested "by alienation or by any title not conferring a new succession" in a new owner, before it falls into possession; the case of a title conferring a new succession to personal property being, as we have seen, already provided for by the 14th section, and that of a title conferring a new succession to real estate not being, as far as we have yet seen, specially provided for. Now, the Legislature might, if it had been so disposed, have reasonably made a distinction in respect of dispositions taking effect before the act, between dispositions of reversions for value and voluntary dispositions (whether taking effect on death or not), and devolutions on death. But it has not done so. The expressions "alienation or other derivative title" and "alienation or any title not conferring a new succession," are of the utmost generality, and include a disposition by the will of a testator dying before the commencement of the act (sect. 2).

Applying the 15th section to the case before us, we should have concluded, without any doubt, that the predecessor must be either the original settlor or the marchioness. The settlor, if the exercise by the marchioness of the general power of appointment interposed between her life estate and her remainder in fee, must be regarded as being, in the events which happened, a disposition of the reversion which was subsisting when the act came into operation; the marchioness, if the reversion which was subsisting on the 19th May, 1853, must be regarded as an interest created by her out of the fee-simple in possession, which, but for her own act, she would have had at the time of her death; and we should not have hesitated to prefer the latter view. But if the settlor was the predecessor, then it seems to be clear, that as he would also have been the successor, if the reversion had not been transmitted from him, no duty would be payable; while, if the marchioness was the predecessor (which we think is the right conclusion, whether her husband died before or after the commencement of the act), the duty would be at the rate of 17. per cent.

The reported reasons for the decision of the Court of Exchequer do not appear to us to be sufficient to control the express terms of the 15th section of the act. Martin, B., said, "The reversion in fee, which was vested in W. D. Gardner, might have been sold or mortgaged, or dealt with in like manner as any other fee-simple estate, and, in fact, was devised to the defendant by will; and it is difficult to see why succession duty should not be payable upon a disposition of it." The answer is, that the testator died before the succession duty was imposed. The learned judge then argued, that if the estate limited by the appointment was to be regarded as inserted in the settlement, W. D. Gardner would take it, not as a remainder under a disposition made by himself, but as a reversion which had never moved out of him; and that, under any view, he, on succeeding to the possession, would not have paid any duty; but the first part of the 15th section was intended to apply only to cases where the disponent or alienee would himself be chargeable with duty. If this construction be correct, the purchaser of a reversion from a reversioner liable to duty at the rate of 17. per cent. would pay duty at that rate; but if his vendor was not liable to any duty, he must pay at the rate of 107. per cent.—an anomalous distinction.

Bramwell, B., considered that a title by will was not within the words "vested by alienation or other derivative title;" but no reason for that construction is stated in the report, and we are unable to suggest any.

It is a remarkable illustration of the uncertainty attending the application of the act, that Mr. Thring, in his observations on the 15th section, puts the very case under discussion, and decides that no duty is payable, because the testator (W. D. Gardner) died before the commencement of the act, and, therefore, would never have become chargeable "if no such derivative title had been created"—a construction which we think is wholly opposed to the plain intent of the enactment, and which can only be regarded as a verbal quibble.

The Court considered the case to be governed by the decision in The Attorney-General v. Yelverton (7 H. & Norm. 306; 7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1250). In that case an estate was settled in 1812 to the use of W. C. for life, and with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainder to E. G. and her issue, with remainder to J. C. for life, with remainder to his son F. C. in tail. In 1850 W. C., being without issue, consented to a disentailing assurance by F. C., and thereupon, for a pecuniary consideration moving from W. C., F. C. charged the estate with 20,000*l.* for the use of W. C., to be paid with interest at the end of a year from the failure of the limitations to W. C. and his issue. A few days after W. C. assigned the 20,000*l.* to trustees, upon trust for two adopted children. W. C. died without issue in 1855. The 20,000*l.* became payable on the death of E. G. without issue in 1857, and the Court of Exchequer, with some doubt, and against the opinion of Bramwell, B., decided that duty was payable on the 20,000*l.*, at the rate of 10*l.* per cent., as a succession from W. C. It was contended against the claim of the Crown, that the purchase of the reversionary 20,000*l.* by W. C. was a contract of insurance, within the 17th section of the act, which did not create the relation of predecessor and successor between F. C. and W. C., the insured; and the whole interest in the money having been absolutely assigned by W. C. in his lifetime to his adopted children, there was no succession from him, within the concluding provisions of that section; and further, that the assignment by W. C. of his reversionary interest was within the 15th section, and F. C. was liable to pay duty on the full value of his estate, without any allowance for the 20,000*l.* (sect. 34). The majority of the Court relied on the general terms of the 2nd section, as including every disposition by reason whereof any person becomes entitled to property upon the death of another, and considered that the 15th section only applied to a reversion in respect of which the transferor would himself be liable to duty. They also relied on the authority of Re Jenkinson (24 Beav. 64), where the circumstances were substantially the same as in Yelverton's case, but the decision proceeded on the ground, that the money charged and made payable on the death of the tenant for life was not "a reversionary property expectant on death," within the first part of the 15th section. "It is impossible," said the Master of the Rolls, "correctly to say, that a sum of money which is to be raised upon the death of a person in existence is a reversionary fund, viz. that it is an existing sum of money settled in a particular way." As it is not likely that this ground of decision will be adopted in any other court, we need not criticise it. In Gardner's case the question arose upon a reversionary estate in land; but the three cases must stand or fall together. If, in Jenkinson's case and Yelverton's case, the defendants had derived title under a disposition made after the commencement of the act, they would not have been entitled to the benefit of the second part of the 15th section, because that only relates to the assignee of a succession; and in Gardner's case, if the will under which the defendants claimed had not come into operation before the act, their title would have conferred a new succession, and thus have been out of the 15th section.

The argument in Yelverton's case against the claim of the Crown, that there was no succession from W. C., because the disposition made by him was an immediate, and not a reversionary, alienation, could not be disposed of merely by reference to the general terms of the 2nd section, because the application of that section is limited by subsequent provisions.

The argument for the defendants, founded on the 17th section of the statute, seems, at first sight, to be justified by the concluding proviso in that section, though it was certainly intended to have a contrary effect. It was even misunderstood by Mr. Thring, when he commented on the act. For his illustration is this:—"A. being entitled to a policy or bond, exempt from duty, settles the moneys payable thereunder on B. for life, with remainder to C. absolutely. C. pays the duty in the same manner as he would in respect of any other personal estate derived from the same source;"—implying that B. pays no duty. Mr. Trevor informs us that Mr. Thring no longer holds this opinion; which is, indeed, obviously incorrect. (Trevor, Taxes on Succession, 257). All that the 17th section enacts is, that an insurance or post obit bond or contract for value shall not create the relation of predecessor and successor between the parties to the contract, or (in the case of an insurance) between the insurers and an assignee of the policy; (the mention of an assignee of the bond or contract being apparently omitted only because such contracts are not assignable at law). This, of course, would leave the case of an assignment of the policy or bond to the operation of the 2nd section, as creating the relation of predecessor and successor between the assignor and the assignee. And what was wanted was, a declaration that such relation should not be created in the case of an assignment for money or money's worth. But instead of that, the framer of the act has added the superfluous and verbose proviso, that "any disposition or devolution of the moneys payable under such policy, bond, or contract, if otherwise such as in itself to create a succession within the provisions of this act, shall be deemed to confer a succession." The words in italics almost justify Mr. Thring's original construction of the proviso.

The act contains no provision for the exemption of a purchaser of a reversionary interest from the duty, except the provision in the 15th section for the purchase of a succession, and that, already discussed, in the 17th section, for the cases of insurances and post obit contracts for the "payment of money or money's worth." So that, according to the terms of the act, if the owner of an estate, in consideration of money, conveys it to the use of himself for his own life, with remainder to the use of the purchaser, the purchaser will be liable on the death of the vendor to pay duty as on a succession from him. If this is not a just inference from the general provisions in the act, the express exceptions of policies and bonds in the 17th section was unnecessary. If it is a just inference, the exception should have been far more extensive; that is to say, to the effect that no disposition for valuable consideration shall be deemed to confer a succession from the person receiving the consideration. The act contains no such provision, nor does it give any general rule or principle for ascertaining the predecessor. But it may, perhaps, be presumed, that if A., for money or money's worth paid by B., limits an interest in property to be enjoyed by B. after A.'s death, B., and not A., is the predecessor. And again, that if the reversion is limited by A. to C., in consideration of money paid by B., B. is the predecessor. But it has been decided, that if the consideration moving to the conveyance is the marriage of the successor, or of the parent of the successor, the person who conveys is the predecessor, although marriage is a valuable consideration. This is the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Han-son, as the result of the cases of Re Jenkinson (24 Beav. 64; 3 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 279); Re Ramsay's Settlement (30 Beav. 75; 7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1225); and The Attorney-General v. Floyer (9 H. L. C. 477; 9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1); and stated in these terms:—"The result of the authorities, therefore, seems to be, that in order to constitute a person a predecessor, in respect of property which is not strictly his own, he must become a purchaser of the jus deponendi for valuable consideration, in money or money's worth; and that marriage, although in the eye of the law it constitutes a valuable consideration, is not a sufficient consideration for this purpose." (P. 25).

In Floyer v. Bankes (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, pp. 684, 1255), Henry Bankes, tenant for life, and W. J. Bankes, his eldest son, tenant in tail, suffered a recovery, and resettled the estate to such uses as they should jointly appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of Henry Bankes for life, with remainder to such uses as W. J. Bankes, if he should survive his father, should appoint; and in default of appointment, to the old uses. In 1821 the two jointly appointed the estates to such uses as they should jointly appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of Henry Bankes for life, with remainder to the use of W. J. Bankes for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of George Bankes, the second son of Henry Bankes, for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder over. On the marriage of George Bankes, in 1822, his father and eldest brother, in exercise of their joint power, charged the estates with the payment of a jointure rent-charge of 500*l.* to the lady in bar of dower, to commence on her husband's death; and in case the lady should survive the appointor and her husband, and there should be no issue male of W. J. Bankes (which events happened), with the payment to the lady of a further rent-charge of 700*l.* Henry Bankes died in 1834; W. J. Bankes died in 1855, without having been married; and shortly afterwards George Bankes and Edmund George Bankes, his eldest son, executed a disentailing deed, and settled the property, limiting a life annuity to Edmund George Bankes in case he should survive his father. George Bankes died in 1856. We have already discussed some questions which arose on the settlement, and were decided in The Attorney-General v. Floyer (7 H. & Norm. 234; 7 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1062; 9 H. L. C. 477; 9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1), 9 Jur., N. S., part 2, p. 29. In the case before the Master of the Rolls, the question was as to the liability of the jointress to succession duty. Sir J. Romilly, M. R., held, that no duty was payable, because the consideration of marriage upon which the settlement was founded was "money's worth," within the 17th section of the act, and because the relinquishment by the lady of her dower, freebench, and thirds was a further consideration. On appeal, the Lord Chancellor held, that the two rent-charges were a succession derived from the appointors, Henry and William J. Bankes (9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 1255). His Lordship said—"A contract, to be excepted, must be bonâ fide made in consideration of money or money's worth—words which appear to have been selected for the purpose of excluding the consideration of marriage. . . . The essential requisites of a contract which is not to create a succession, are clearly defined by the 17th section. First, it must be a contract by one person to pay money or money's worth to another; secondly, it must be made bonâ fide for a valuable consideration, in money or money's worth—the contract creating personal liability between the contracting parties; and, thirdly, such a contract is prevented from creating a succession only as between the contracting parties; for all that the 17th section does is to declare that there shall be no relation of predecessor and successor between the person bound to pay and the person entitled to receive. As between any other persons, the contract may create a succession, and the transmission of the property to be received under such contract, by the death before the time of payment of the person entitled to it, may also create a succession." His Lordship then observed that there was no contract between the jointress and the appointors; and that if there was an implied contract between the husband and wife, it was not shewn that there were any estates out of which the wife would be dowable; and he added, that to treat marriage as a consideration within the 17th section, "would strike the words 'in money or money's worth,' which are annexed, and are restrictive of the words 'valuable consideration,' out of the section." The distinction between "value" or "valuable" and "money's worth" is not very clear; and if any distinction was intended to be made, the words have been unfortunately selected.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday, June 13.

Earl De Grey and Ripon presented a petition from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce against certain provisions of the Partnership Amendment Bill.

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT BILL.

Lord Stanley of Alderley, in moving the second reading of this bill, observed that one of its objects was to enable persons to lend money to traders, and receive a share of profits, without rendering themselves liable to the law of partnership. According to the law as it now stood, a person might lend money to any extent to a trader, and receive interest to any extent, without being constituted a partner, or rendering himself liable to the engagements of the trader if he became bankrupt; but if he lent money on the condition of receiving a share of the profits, he became liable to all the engagements of the firm. He could see no good reason for the distinction between these two sets of money lenders, or why they should be treated in a different manner. Since 1855 the principle of limited liability had been very generally applied to all large undertakings in the country, and this bill might be considered as a complement to the Limited Liability Acts, by placing private traders on the same footing. In this respect the private trader would receive a great advantage, and at the same time he thought the creditor would derive greater security than he obtained at present. Besides enabling a person lending money to obtain a share of profits, the bill proposed to allow a widow or child of a deceased partner to receive a share of profits, without becoming a partner, which they could not do at present without rendering themselves liable to the debts of the concern. It would also enable a trader to give a clerk or servant a share of profits as a part of, or in addition to, a salary, without making him a partner. This would operate as an additional inducement to the clerk or servant to exert himself in the successful prosecution of the business.

Lord St. Leonards considered this a most important measure. There could be no doubt as to the law which regulated advances to traders. It was perfectly established, that if a man took the profits of business, he must be content to take the losses too. This law had led to the flourishing state of the country. If a man entered into trade, he did so with a view to profit. He gave to that trade the whole energy of his mind, his time, thoughts, and genius. It was on this foundation, the individual exertion of every man, that the prosperity of the country rested. His noble friend said that that measure was a sort of set-off to limited liability; but limited liability was a dangerous thing, which had already much altered the character of trading in this country. It was greatly to be desired, that the Government would take a comprehensive and statesmanlike view of the whole matter, and consider the general operations of all these limited companies, instead of asking their Lordships to deal with these measures piecemeal and one by one. Mortgage debentures would be floated in millions by these companies, and was it to be supposed that Exchequer bills could hold their ground against them? It would be most mischievous to encourage partnerships in which men with a certain capital could sweep away the lion's share of the profits without incurring any risk or performing any labour. By this bill, if a man sold half his business, and reserved to himself the other half, he would not share half the liability, as he ought in fairness to do, but would escape altogether; while, on the other hand, if he retained the whole business in his own hands, he would be liable for the whole of the risks of the concern. That was something so monstrous, that the very statement of it ought to make their Lordships hesitate in assenting to the second reading of that measure. A more dangerous blow could not be struck at the trading credit of the country than would be inflicted by such a bill.

Lord Cranworth asked whom it was the object of the existing law to protect—the lender or the borrower? At present one man might borrow and another lend a sum of money at an interest of 5*l.*, 10*l.*, or 15*l.* per cent., or on any other terms that might be agreed between them. The noble and learned Lord opposite seemed to think, however, that this measure would operate hardly on the creditor; but the creditor's remedy would not really be affected by it; it would remain as it was before. If the creditor recovered a judgment against the partnership, he could take the partnership assets. Unless this bill, or a bill of a similar description, were passed, a very grievous injury would be inflicted on private traders, who had to compete with companies now having the benefit of limited liability.

Lord Wensleydale was understood to say he had no objection to the principle of the bill, provided certain alterations were made in some of its clauses.

The Lord Chancellor would be sorry if the able arguments which, in common with the majority of the House, he had not had the good fortune to hear with sufficient distinctness, induced any of their Lordships to vote against the second reading of this bill, which had been introduced for the purpose of freeing the law of partnership from an anomaly founded upon an erroneous decision pronounced many years ago, which had led to the most mischievous consequences.

There could be no doubt that the existence of a partnership should depend upon the conduct and intention of the parties, and that where there was a contract and agreement between the parties, the law should declare the existence of a partnership, but that where there was no such contract and agreement, the law should not force a partnership upon parties except in cases where they had held themselves out to the public to be partners. But the principle of the law of England, as construed by a decision given nearly 100 years ago, went to the extent of declaring, that in any case where individuals shared the profits of an undertaking, they should be partners in the eye of the law, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary which they might have entered into among themselves. That principle was a most unjust one, and it was repugnant to the principles of English law. It had, however, taken its rise from the natural tendency of our Courts to give validity to a contract if they could possibly do so. A case came before Lord Mansfield, in which he found he could not do so in consequence of the very large rate of interest, which would have rendered the contract void under the then existing Usury Laws. In order, therefore, to uphold the agreement between the parties, Lord Mansfield ruled that it should be upheld as a partnership. By general consent the Usury Laws, the parent of the principle of partnership, against which this bill was directed, had been done away, and it was time now to get rid of their mischievous offspring. In other cases the law of England had taken great care to prevent fraud. If a man handed over money or goods to a trader, that money or those goods were liable to the trader's creditor; but that was a very different thing from making a man liable to not only the full amount which he had lent to a trader, but to the last farthing which he possessed in the world. Under the ruling of Lord Mansfield, acted on by the judges, the law invented a contract which did not exist, and then made the parties to that supposed contract liable for the fulfilment of engagements which they never intended to undertake. A learned and eminent friend of his had laid down, that if a man had agreed to share in the gross receipts from a business he was not a partner, but if he had agreed to share in the net profits he was a partner. Now, where was the difference between the two cases? Again: if a person in trade said to his clerk, "I shall give you 500*l.*, which you shall take out of the profits," the clerk at once became a partner; but if the employer said to him, "I shall give you 500*l.* a year if I make 1000*l.*," not adding words stating that the 500*l.* was to come out of profits, the clerk was not a partner. Such were the artifices which lawyers were obliged to make use of in order to apply this principle of partnership. They were obliged to go round, and traverse, and make use of subtle distinctions, which brought the law into contempt, because it put it at variance with the common sense of mankind. Trade contracts ought not to depend on subtle distinction, or what was called "judge-made law," but on the wholesome and well-established principles of the law of England. The object of this bill was to remove an objectionable exception. It was a bill of great importance to the community, for if there were one principle better established in reason and common sense than another, it was that trade should be free; that mercantile contracts should be free; that these contracts, as far as they possibly could be, should be construed in accordance with the intentions of the parties; that they should be upheld by law, and take effect just as they had been intended to take effect. The principle which this bill would put an end to had a very injurious operation as regarded encouragement to industry and talent. A man might be willing to encourage industry or talent by an advance of 1000*l.* or 5000*l.* towards a doubtful enterprise; but he was unable to do so because of the frightful consequences of those decisions staring him in the face. He thought it was time to declare that the law of partnership should be of a more liberal character, and more in accordance with the English law generally. It had been the policy of our laws to make trade in land free, because it had been determined that property should not be locked up for longer than a particular time. The general policy of our law was in accordance with the principles of political economy, but the partnership law as it existed, in virtue of judicial decisions, was an exception. He trusted that their Lordships would give their countenance to a bill which was wise and prudent in its design, and which would be of great advantage to the mercantile and commercial interests of the country. He believed that many of the social difficulties which now existed between employers and employed would probably be removed by the operation of this bill. There were many classes of intelligent workmen whose wise employers would desire to bind to a concern by giving them an interest in its welfare, and making their remuneration depend on its success. That could not now be done; but if this bill were passed, it would be possible to establish such a binding tie as this between employers and employed. If that were the result of this measure, he was sure that their Lordships would agree that a more beneficial and wholesome measure could not be introduced into Parliament.

The bill was then read a second time.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

The House went into committee upon this bill, but after some conversation the House resumed; and

The Earl of Malnesbury gave notice that on Thursday he would move that the bill be referred to a select committee.

LAND DEBENTURES (IRELAND) BILL.

The Earl of Cork moved the second reading of this bill, and expressed his willingness to refer it to the same select committee to which the previous bill should be referred.

The bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday, June 12.

THE LAW OF EVIDENCE BILL.

In answer to Mr. Scully,

Sir F. Kelly said it was his intention to proceed with his bill during the present session, and he hoped the Secretary of State for the Home Department would give him Thursday night for that purpose.

Sir G. Grey said the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Malt Duty Bill was fixed for Thursday, but there would be no objection to place the Law of Evidence Bill next on the paper.

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS.

In answer to Mr. Göschén,

Mr. Hibbert said, that as the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the subject of capital punishment within the precincts of the prison had not been presented, he should postpone the second reading of his bill until Wednesday, the 21st instant.

RECORD OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

The House went again into committee upon this bill.

On clause 6,

Mr. Whiteside moved, in line 25, to leave out the words, "and no declaration of title so entered upon the record shall be registered in the office for registering deeds in Ireland."

The Attorney-General admitted the force of the amendment, and proposed to meet the right hon. gentleman's views by the addition of certain words to clause 10.

On clause 7,

Mr. Whiteside moved to leave out the word "not" in line 33, his object being to render the bill completely permissive, as the promoters of it said they wished it to be.

The Attorney-General objected to the amendment, on the ground that the word proposed to be left out would not, in the slightest degree, affect its permissive character.

The amendment was negatived, and the clause was agreed to, as were also clauses 8 and 9.

On clause 10,

Mr. Whiteside moved the insertion of words giving access to registry of deeds in Ireland for the purpose of inspection, according to the statutes regulating the Registry of Deeds Office.

The Attorney-General opposed the amendment, as calculated only to gratify the curiosity with regard to private property of persons not otherwise interested in it; but ultimately conceded the addition of words, giving an enlarged power of inspection, intermediate between the clause and the amendment—adopting, in fact, the clause for the English Registration Act.

The clause, thus amended, and the remainder of the clauses were agreed to, with some verbal amendments.

Mr. Whiteside moved the following additional clause:—
"That any person who has obtained from the Commissioners for the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland or from the Landed Estates Court a conveyance or declaration of title, or who shall hereafter obtain the same, may apply every five years by summary petition, supported by such evidence as the Court shall require, to be declared the owner, with registry of indefeasible title as originally granted by the Court; and upon the declaration of the Court, granted and registered or recorded as may be required by law, the person named therein shall be deemed owner as declared, to all intents and purposes."

The Attorney-General objected to the clause.

Sir H. Cairns said the clause was likely to introduce a new question as to costs.

The clause was negatived.

The schedule, with slight amendment, was agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

The Colonial Laws Validity Bill, the Colonial Marriages Validity Bill, and the Penalties Law Amendment Bill were read a second time.

PRISONS BILL.

Some amendments in this bill were considered and agreed to.

Tuesday, June 13.

PRISONS BILL.

On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Mr. Neate said he objected to the principles of the bill; in the first instance, because it continued unnecessarily a bad system; next, because it delegated important duties to persons not the best qualified to perform them. Another great objection to the bill was, that it did not provide for the promotion of gaolers, which was requisite for the efficiency of the public service. The governors of prisons were very much dissatisfied with the present system of appointments being in the hands of the magistrates. Another great objection he had to the bill was, its increase of severity, and he thought it would be a great stain upon the legislation of the country if the House were to sanction the principle of penal non-productive labour. In other countries, the work given to prisoners was not merely for the sake of punishment. Labour for the mere sake of punishment was a species of torture. The hon. member here referred to some notes which he had made upon a recent visit to a French prison. The periods of confinement in that prison were similar to our own. The prisoners were employed in productive labour, and every one was allowed about a quarter of his day's earnings; part of the money was handed over to him, and he laid it out in some little indulgences. The average earnings were about 10d. a day, and he was allowed to spend 2d., and 2d. more was put away, and given to him when liberated. There was no solitary confinement, but no conversation was allowed; and, with a view to preserve order in separate cells, a monitorial system was adopted, and one prisoner of better conduct than the rest was placed over a cell where several slept, and of course the warder paid repeated visits. He thought it was a matter of serious reflection to the country, that while we professed to be the most Christian and the most religious, the most loyal and prosperous people in the world, yet, while other nations were pursuing a course of humane and gentle legislation, we found it necessary to retrace our steps, and return to increased severity.

RECORD OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.

A motion for the insertion of the "stamps" clause in this bill was agreed to.

The following bills were then considered, and their various clauses agreed to:—Navy and Marines (Wills), Navy and Marines (Property of Deceased), Navy and Marines (Pay and Pensions), Colonial Laws Validity, and Colonial Marriages Validity.

THEATRES, &C. BILL.

Mr. Locke in moving the second reading of this bill, explained that such a measure had been rendered necessary in consequence of the action taken by the managers of certain theatres. Having obtained a monopoly, they wished to prevent all other persons who did not possess the Lord Chamberlain's license from giving any stage performances which interfered with such license. These powers were claimed under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 61, called the Dramatic Licensing Act, which empowered the Lord Chamberlain to license theatres in certain districts of the metropolis—namely, in Westminster, the Tower Hamlets, Southwark, Lambeth, and Marylebone. The rest of the metropolis and the country generally were licensed by the magistrates, with the exception of certain royal residences, concerning which there was some dispute. Previous to the passing of the act the patent theatres—Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Haymarket—possessed the exclusive right of performing the legitimate drama, although what that was it was difficult to discover, for, with the exception of Sadler's Wells and one or two other theatres, the performances were by no means legitimate. Besides the Licensing Act, the 6 & 7 Vict., there was the act of the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, which was called the Music and Dancing Act, and was passed to restrain persons from having public music or dancing on their premises without the license of the magistrates granted at quarter sessions. Under that act the minor theatres, as distinguished from Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Haymarket, were in the habit of playing what were called burlettas and melodramas, which were not prohibited under the act. In 1831-2 a select committee of that House was appointed to consider the subject of dramatic literature. The committee came to the conclusion that the trade in theatres ought to be thrown open, and that all the theatres ought to have the power of performing any plays they thought proper. A crusade had been commenced against the music halls. There was not a literary institution in the country, if these managers of theatres had their way, that would be permitted to perform a scene out of Shakespeare's plays or a portion of an opera. The managers formerly cried out for free trade, but they were now monopolists. They claimed to go further than the proprietors of the patent theatres, and wanted to have a monopoly of every species of stage performance. Such a state of things ought not to be permitted. The theatrical managers alleged that they wanted to uphold the drama; but did they do so? It was said that in some of those music halls eating and drinking and smoking were allowed. Well, was the House aware that a license to a theatre to perform stage plays carried with it a wine, beer, and spirit license? In most theatres beer, gin, and cordials were sold. No less a sum than 1,067,000*l.* had been spent in building and fitting the London concert halls, music halls, and entertainment galleries. These places would accommodate 179,000 people, and he believed that they were conducted with the greatest propriety. The number of theatres in London was twenty-three; the number of these places of entertainment, forty-five. He stated shortly the object of the bill was to legalise the performance of stage plays at any place where the magistrates' music and dancing license had been obtained. But if the House thought that the performance of every species of stage plays ought not to be sanctioned at any but licensed theatres, could there be any objection to the music halls having the same privilege which the minor theatres possessed before the monopoly was broken up—namely, the performance of burlettas, interludes, and melodramas? It must be remembered that the Lord Chamberlain's surveillance would still apply to these places; and he proposed certain provisions to insure the safety of the audience.

Mr. Neavegate said it was evident the subject was a very wide one. He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. H. Berkeley believed that this bill would have the effect of turning every potherhouse into a theatre, and every theatre into a potherhouse.

Dr. Brady also thought the passing of the bill would reduce the drama to the lowest pitch it had ever stood at in the country.

The debate was adjourned.

Wednesday, June 14.

The Penalties Law Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Colonial Laws Validity Bill, the Colonial Marriages Validity Bill, and the Lunatic Asylum Act (1853), &c. Amendment Bill, were read a third time, and passed.

under each is collected all the Statutes relating to it, with explanatory notes. Besides the easy access afforded by the alphabetical arrangement of the subjects, a very copious general Index supplies the means of ready reference to all the subjects of lesser importance to which the various Statutes are directed."

"We could not say more for this great work by any words of approbation than by this short description of it. It is an admirable design admirably executed."—Law Times, May 13, 1855.

"In the debate on the proposed consolidation of the Statutes, on the 9th February, 1854, Lord Campbell said, "that the Statutes at large extended to about fifty volumes folio, but all the Statutes which were usually required by lawyers for reference might be found in three octavo volumes, compiled by his learned friend Mr. Welsby. When he (Lord Campbell) was upon the Bench, he always had this work by him, and no Statutes were ever referred to by the Bar which he could not find in it."

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JUNE 24, 1865.

Among the difficulties that have confronted owners of adjoining properties on rebuilding or altering their premises, one question has in modern times been conspicuously prominent, viz. what is the effect of the alteration of ancient windows by the person entitled to them? For the benefit of non-professional readers who may seek for information in our columns, we may mention, that when the right to have light through a particular window is once established by twenty years' uninterrupted user, the adjoining owner cannot build on his land so as to materially obstruct the passage of light through the window, and that, therefore, the acquisition of such a right very seriously detracts from the value of the adjoining property over which it dominates, and very frequently altogether prevents its being used for any valuable purpose. The mode of preventing the acquisition of such a right when a new window is opened is, for the adjoining owner to erect on his own land a structure of some kind sufficient to stop the access of light to the window, and so prevent that uninterrupted user by means of which it might grow into a permanent right. Two pieces of land adjoin; they belong to different owners; one may build a house, and open a hundred windows; the other also may build on his own land, and block up the hundred windows; and on neither side is there any infraction of the law. But when the right is once acquired, as it may be if there is no opposition, and the window becomes an ancient window, then the adjoining owner, rebus sic stantibus, can no longer build either a house or any kind of structure which will interrupt the passage of light to the ancient window. Now, suppose the case of the right established, and the ancient window in existence, can its owner, on rebuilding his premises, enlarge or alter the structure of his ancient window, and yet not lose his right? And if he does by such a step lose his right, does he lose it entirely and for ever, or may he, by restoring the window to its original state, have his right again? Or may he, without enlarging the ancient window itself, or in any way changing its site or structure, ingeniously surround it with new windows, and make it a kind of protector to the settlement, and say to his neighbour, "You cannot make me undo one bit of all this; my ancient window still is there; you cannot build before it?" On these questions there have been for a long time many conflicting opinions. The House of Lords, however, has, in a recent case, now settled the law, and given, at all events, certainty, instead of doubt. With regard to the various decisions and dicta on these points before the court of ultimate appeal was reached, some of the judges seem to have approached the view finally taken; others to have differed by various shades; and the views of each of them are so well supported by reason and authority, that any of them might reasonably have been held to have been right, and may still be thought by their propounders only to be wrong, because held to be wrong by the highest court of judicature. The House of Lords has now, in the recent case of Tapping v. Jones (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 309), without hearing counsel, except on the side unfavourable to its judgment, distinctly overruled the well-known cases of Renshaw v. Bean (18 Q. B. 112; 16 Jur., part 1, p. 814) and Hutchinson v. Copestake (9 C. B., N. S., 826; 8 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 54), and has placed the law, without hesitation, on grounds not to be mistaken—a plain and simple exposition of the law given, as it were, from a hill not to be commanded, where the air is always clear and serene above the errors, and wanderings, and mists in the vale below.

We can only shortly advert to some of the decisions. In Renshaw v. Bean the plaintiff had, on rebuilding his premises, added an upper storey, opened windows in it, and enlarged and altered the position of his ancient windows in the lower storeys. The defendant, the adjoining owner, subsequently also rebuilt his premises, and thereby darkened the windows both in the upper and lower storeys of the plaintiff's house; and it was held that he was justified in doing so; the plaintiff having, by his alterations, exceeded the limits of his right in such a manner that the defendant could not obstruct the new windows without obstructing the passage of light through what remained of the ancient windows; and it was, therefore, held, that the plaintiff lost his right, at least, until he restored the house to its former condition; though semble, that such alteration did not destroy the right altogether. The old authorities were very much referred to in the arguments in Renshaw v. Bean, and among other observations, Lord Campbell, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "We by no means say that where the owner of a house alters the dimensions of an ancient window, that he may in no case maintain an action for that which is an obstruction to the window in its new state, and would have been an obstruction to it in its former state; this would be contrary to a long series of decisions, beginning with Luttrell's case (reported by Lord Coke), "If the wall in which the window is be on the extremity of the owner's land, and the window is enlarged at the lower part of it, the owner of the adjoining land can easily obstruct the unprivileged part of the window, and would not be justified in building a wall which would obstruct the whole; but there was no mode of merely obstructing the new and unprivileged windows and the privileged portion of the windows in the lower storeys in this case; and the obstruction of the privileged portions of these windows is a necessary consequence of the obstruction of the unprivileged portions."

In Hutchinson v. Copestake it was held, in accordance with Renshaw v. Bean, that where the owner of a dominant tenement has windows which are privileged, and he enlarges them, the owner of the servient tenement has a right to prevent the acquisition of the new right, and block up the unprivileged part, and that if he cannot block up the one, without at the same time interfering with the other, he is not liable to an action for obstructing the whole. The same question arose in Jones v. Tapping (11 C. B., N. S., 283; 9 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 462). The plaintiff being possessed of a house of three storeys, with privileged windows, rebuilt it, lowering and enlarging the windows in the first and second floor, and adding two new storeys to the building, with windows. The altered windows each occupied part of the space before occupied by the ancient windows; the window on the third floor remained as it always had been. The defendant rebuilt his premises, and obstructed the whole of the plaintiff's windows, it being impossible (as found in a special case) to obstruct the new light without at the same time obstructing the old. The plaintiff thereupon stopped up the new windows and restored the ancient windows, and then required the defendant to remove the obstruction. It was held by the whole Court, that inasmuch as the defendant could not obstruct the new lights, as he had a right to do, without obstructing the old at the same time, he was justified in obstructing all. It was further held by Byles, J., and Keating, J., that the obstruction being lawful at the time of the erection, the defendant was not bound to remove it, on the defendant's stopping up the new windows and restoring the ancient windows. And by Erle, C. J., and Williams, J., that the continuance of the obstruction, after the cause for its erection had been withdrawn, was an unlawful act.

The old doctrine as to the right to light resting on an implied grant, was gone into in the arguments, and much considered, though Williams, J., observed that it was difficult to conceive how the right to light could be rested on an implied grant, since Lord Tenterden's Act.

The cases of Renshaw v. Bean and Jones v. Tapling were commented on by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in Martin v. Heaton (11 Jur., N. S., part 1, p. 5), who, though impressed with the difficulties of the subject, rather questioned the right of reacquiring the right to an ancient window, where the ancient window has been altered so as no longer to be the window it was. And as to the case where the act done by the owner of the dominant tenement is not the alteration of his ancient light, but an attempt to acquire an entirely independent light or easement, by the opening of an independent new window, so that, while preserving his ancient light, he endeavoured to acquire a new easement, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, without expressing any decided opinion, stated that his leaning would be against such right. The junior judge in Tapling v. Jones withdrew his opinion, in order that judgment might be given in favour of the plaintiff, and the case was appealed against; and on the appeal in the Exchequer Chamber the judgment was affirmed, though not without different views of the law being taken by the judges; Mr. Justice Crompton and Mr. Justice Wightman considering that the original obstruction was lawful, but that continuing the obstruction after the occasion for it had ceased was unlawful; Mr. Baron Bramwell and Mr. Justice Blackburn thinking that the original obstruction was unlawful; and Chief Baron Pollock and Baron Martin holding that the original obstruction being lawful when erected, could not become unlawful at the option and by the act of the aggressor.

The case came finally before the House of Lords, who put the law on the simple footing of an absolute statutory title, and the Lord Chancellor observed, that after an enjoyment of an access of light for twenty years, without interruption, the right was declared by statute to be absolute, and indefeasible; and that it would seem, therefore, that it could not be lost or defeated by a subsequent temporary intermission of enjoyment, not amounting to an abandonment; and, moreover, that this absolute and indefeasible right, which was the creation of the statute, was not subjected to any condition or qualification, nor was it liable to be affected or prejudiced by any attempt to extend the access or use of light beyond that which, having been enjoyed uninterruptedly during the required period, was declared not to be liable to be defeated, and that the right to enjoy light through a window looking on a neighbour's land, on whatever foundation it might have rested previously to the passing of the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, depends now on the provisions of that statute. The Lord Chancellor had, at the commencement of his judgment, rejected the doctrine of presumed grant as no longer applicable, saying, that since the statute it was matter juris positivi, and did not require, and therefore ought not, to be rested on any presumption or fiction of license having been obtained from the adjoining proprietor; and the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Chelmsford unanimously held, that the defendant below was not, even in the first instance, notwithstanding the attempted encroachments and alterations by the plaintiff below, justified in erecting the building complained of, and obstructing the access of light and air to the privileged portions of the windows of his house; and the judgment below was affirmed, though not on the same grounds on which the majority of the judges below proceeded.

The practical information to be deduced from the foregoing observations for the benefit of the owners of adjoining properties who may either contemplate the rebuilding their premises, or be apprehensive of, and desirous of resisting, encroachments attempted by the alteration and enlargement of ancient windows, or the opening of new ones overlooking their property, is, that a man, on rebuilding his premises, may open any number of new windows; and if there are ancient lights, or, in other words, privileged windows, he may alter or enlarge these, or surround them with new windows, and in this state of things his old right will be preserved, and it may be very difficult for his neighbour to prevent the acquisition of a new right to the new windows, or the enlarged portion of the old ones; for the law says, that whatever he does, he must not obstruct the ancient windows, or any portion of them, however disguised by alterations and enlargements. The right is still there in the eye of the law, always supposing that there has been no act done on the part of the dominant owner unequivocally shewing an intention to abandon it altogether. Now, the neighbour whose premises are overlooked may obstruct by any structure or mechanical device placed on his own land all the entirely new windows, and all the new portion of the old windows, though he cannot raise a building that will block up the old site of the ancient windows, or any portion of it. And thus, in the case of contending adjoining owners, the matter is remitted to the skill of the architects. The rebuilding architect can exercise his ingenuity to so blend the old and new that the one cannot be obstructed without the other. The resisting architect, on the other hand, must endeavour, by some structure or mechanical device, to interrupt all that is new, without interrupting that precise amount of light and air that used to have access to the ancient windows, which must be ascertained, as well as may be, although the ancient windows themselves are no longer discernible. The law itself, when once finally settled, is a simple thing. Its rules are such that he who runs may read them, though the difficulty will still remain of applying them to the facts; and this difficulty of applying the law to the facts seems wisely to be left for the jury. It is said that the late Mr. Justice Maule, on being asked what questions were for the judge, and what for the jury, replied, that easy questions were for the judge, and difficult ones for the jury. So here, the duty of a judge will henceforth be easy, and the difficulty will only be for the owners of adjoining properties, and their architects, in the first instance, to be followed, if litigation ensues, by that of the jury, who may have to settle on oath the precise effect of the structures on both sides, and the precise limits of ancient lights no longer discernible to the material eye, and ponder without meat, drink, or fire, on very simple law, and very doubtful facts.

LORD WESTBURY'S EXPOSITION OF THE LAW OF PARTNERSHIP.

"If a person in trade said to his clerk, 'I shall give you 500*l.* a year, which you shall take out of the profits,' the clerk at once became a partner; but if the employer said to him, 'I shall give you 500*l.* a year if I make 1000*l.*,' not adding words stating that the 500*l.* was to come out of profits, the clerk was not a partner. Such were the artifices which lawyers were obliged to make use of in order to apply the principle of partnership. They were obliged to go round, and traverse, and make use of subtle distinctions, which brought the law into contempt, because they put it at variance with the common sense of mankind. Trade contracts ought not to depend on subtle distinctions, or what was called judge-made law, but on the wholesome and well-established principles of the law of England."—(Debate on the Partnership Amendment Bill, House of Lords, June 13). [For the information of our less learned readers, we may state that the judge-made rule of law, which the learned Lord Chancellor characterises so acutely, and illustrates so accurately, is as follows:—"The persons who divide (or partien, or are partners in) the profits of a business are the persons for whom it is carried on." The wholesome and well-established principle of the law which his Lordship desires to restore, by abolishing this subtle and mischievous distinction, appears, after diligent search, to be that which was embodied by an ancient worthy (temp. Henry V) in the maxim, "Base is the slave that pays."]

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

TRINITY TERM, 1865.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the Superior Courts, the Examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of twenty-six, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

1. John Crick Freeman, who served his clerkship to Messrs. John & William Crick, of Maldon, and Mr. Andrew Storey, of London.
2. William Holmes, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Ward, of Burslem, and Messrs. Ingle & Gooddy, of London.
3. Francis Cooper Dumville Smythe, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Smythe, of London, and Messrs. Pownall, Son, Cross, & Knott, of London.

4. William George Chambers, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Hellard, of Portsmouth, and Messrs. Williamson, Hill, & Co., of London.

4. Samuel Parks Clare, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Howard, Dollman, & Lowther, of London.

5. Walter Taylor, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Yarde, of London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following Prizes of Books:—
To Mr. Freeman, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn.

To Mr. Holmes, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Smythe, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Chambers, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Clare, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Taylor, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The Examiners have also certified that the following candidates, under the age of twenty-six, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

Thomas Frederic Artindale, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Handsley & Tattersall, of Burnley.

Herbert Bramley, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Bramley & Gainsford, of Sheffield, and Messrs. Prior & Bigg, of London.

Frederick Corbett, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edward Corles, of Worcester.

Samuel John Daw, jun., who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Kitson, of Torquay, and Mr. George Edward Philbrick, of London.

William Edward Marsh, who served his clerkship to Mr. Richard Marsh, of Leigh, Lancashire, and Messrs. N. C. & C. Milne, of London.

Henry John Tweedy, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Smith & Roberts, of Truro, and Messrs. Gregory & Rowcliffes, of London.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The Examiners have further announced to the following candidates, that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes if they had not been above the age of twenty-six:—

1. Francis Buckland.
2. John Edward Thorley Graham.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 157; of these 143 were passed, and 14 postponed.

By order of the Council,

E. W. WILLIAMSON, Secretary.

Law Society's Hall, Chancery-lane,
London, June 16, 1865.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday, June 15.

Lord Stratford de Redcliffe presented a petition against the Courts of Justice Site Bill from a lady who owned seventeen houses in New Boswell-court, Lincoln's-inn. This lady derived her only means of living from the rents of those houses, and through the frequent notices which had been served upon her, in reference to the proposed scheme for building the new courts of justice, she had lost the chief portion of her rents since the beginning of the year 1880. Although he was not exactly aware of what could be done for the lady's relief, he thought her case worthy of some consideration, when the question of compensating the owners of the property taken under the bill arose.

Lord Chelmsford had great doubts whether there was any legal mode of compensating the lady when the bill passed.

The Lord Chancellor said the evil arising from notices of this description had attained such proportions, that some general legislative enactment should be brought in to meet it.

COMMON-LAW COURTS (FEES) BILL.

On the motion of the Lord Chancellor, the Commons' amendment to the Lords' amendments on this bill was considered, and agreed to.

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT BILL.

This bill passed through committee.

LAND DEBENTURES BILL.

On the motion of the Earl of Cork, this bill was referred to the select committee before which the Mortgage Debentures Bill was to be inquired into.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

On the motion of the Earl of Malmesbury, this bill was referred to a select committee, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Marlborough, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Marquis of Bath, the Earl of Malmesbury, Viscount Hutchinson, Lord Boyle, Lord Stanley of Alderley, Lord Cranworth, Lord St. Leonards, and Lord Chelmsford. The noble earl gave notice that he should move the addition of the names of Earl Grey, Lord Redesdale, and another, whose name we did not catch.

The Land Debentures Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be referred to the same select committee.

Monday, June 19.

The royal assent was given, by commission, to the following bills:—Commissioners of Supply (Scotland); District Church Tithes, Middlesex (No. 2); Lancaster Court of Chancery; Married Women's Property (Ireland); Pilotage Orders Confirmation; Common Law Courts (Fees); Local Government Supplemental (No. 3); Dogs Regulation (Ireland); Courts of Justice Concentration (Site); Courts of Justice Building; Militia Ballots Suspension; Militia Pay, and about fifty private bills.

THE STATUTE LAW.

The Lord Chancellor presented a bill for completing the revision of the Statute Law and expurgation of the Statute Book. The noble Lord said that the statutes of the realm were at present in forty-four quarto volumes. The bills presented by him on former occasions, and which had passed into a law, carried the revision and expurgation down to the reign of James II inclusive, and the bill which he had now the honour to introduce completed the entire work of revision. He was happy to say, that if this bill passed into a law the new edition of the whole of the living statutes which would follow would probably be comprised in ten volumes only, of the same average size as at present. This, however, was by no means the end of the work. The next step would be to arrange the Statute Law in the form of a digest, under the most appropriate heads, forming a complete analytical arrangement, and then to revise and expurgate the unwieldy and still increasing mass of the decided cases, reducing them to such as constituted the body of existing authorities, and which might in their turn be digested and arranged. Their Lordships would be glad to hear that the House of Commons had voted a sum of money for this purpose, and he trusted that the work would go on successfully until the whole of the written and unwritten law was ascertained, reduced into order, and brought within a reasonable compass. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the first reading of the bill.

After a few words from Lord St. Leonards, The bill was read a first time.

The Partnership Amendment Bill was reported, with amendments.

The following bills were read a second time:—The Prisons (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill, the Trespass (Scotland) Bill, the Ecclesiastical Leasing Act Amendment Bill, the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation Bill, the Lunatic Asylum Act (1833) Amendment Bill, the Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 2) Bill, the Smoke Nuisances (Scotland) Acts Amendment Bill, the Procurators (Scotland) Bill, the Churches and Chapels Exemption (Scotland) Bill, the Colonial Laws Validity Bill, Colonial Marriages Validity Bill, and the Defence Act (1860) Amendment Bill.

Tuesday, June 20.

Lord St. Leonards presented a petition from the Chamber of Commerce and manufacturers of the city of Edinburgh, praying that provision might be made in the Law of Partnership Bill for the registration of the special partnerships, and for preventing the withdrawal of the money advanced before the time contracted for.

Lord Redesdale presented a petition in favour of an alteration in the constitution of the Final Court of Appeal.

PRISONS BILL.

Earl Granville, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that its object was twofold. It was partly to consolidate the existing law in relation to prisons, which in some particulars was contradictory, and beyond that, it proposed to amend the present law. The amendments which it proposed to introduce into the law of prisons were based chiefly on the recommendations of a committee of their Lordships' House. The chief object was to secure greater uniformity in the management and discipline of prisons, and greater uniformity also in the carrying out of the punishment of hard labour. The bill was one of great detail.

After some observations by the Earl of Carnarvon, the bill was read a second time.

LAND DEBENTURES (IRELAND).

The Earl of Cork moved that the Land Debentures (Ireland) Bill be committed to a committee of the whole House.

Lord St. Leonards opposed the motion. The committee were of opinion that, on principle, the bill ought not to proceed. It would be an invitation to every Irish proprietor to mortgage his estate. It would enable him to make a sham mortgage, to get it registered, and then to issue debentures on his property to the amount of that sham mortgage.

The Earl of Donoughmore said that the decision of the committee was arrived at by the votes of five English peers against three Irish ones, and he thought that his noble friend was perfectly justified in appealing against it to the whole House. This measure had been very carefully considered by a select committee of the House of Commons, and had received the sanction of that House. He hoped that their Lordships would agree to the motion.

The House then divided, when the numbers were—

The bill as amended then passed through committee.

The following bills then passed through committee, and the reports were received:—Mortgage Debentures (Amendments), Prisons (Scotland) Act Amendment, Trespass (Scotland), Ecclesiastical Leasing Act (1858) Amendment, Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation, Pilotage Order Confirmation (No. 2), Smoke Nuisances (Scotland) Acts Amendment, Procurators (Scotland), Churches and Chapels Exemption (Scotland), Colonial Laws Validity, Colonial Marriages Validity, and Defence Act (1860) Amendment.

The Union Chargeability Bill was read a third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 15.

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

In committee on this recommitment bill,

On clause 16, Mr. M'Mahon said this clause made receipts given for sums deposited on allotments of shares liable to stamp duty. Was it not desirable that the letters of allotment themselves should also be subject to the duty?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that at present he felt precluded from requiring that letters of allotment should be subject to the duty.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 22, Sir C. O'Loughlen said this clause directed that appeals against adjudications on stamp duties in Scotch cases should be determined by the Court of Exchequer in Scotland. He wished to know why appeals in Irish cases was not to be determined in Ireland.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, if that was not so, he would introduce an amendment.

On clause 25, Sir W. Jolliffe inquired to whom the appeal lay from the decisions of the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue and of the justices. He had hoped that the Chancellor would have introduced a clause which would have prevented the litigation and expenses likely to arise under this clause.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the appeal lay to the superior courts, as in ordinary cases. The subject was one more of police than coming strictly within the duties of a finance minister.

On the motion of The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the following new clause was substituted for clause 7:—

"In lieu of the stamp duty of 5s. now chargeable by law on any charterparty, or any document chargeable with stamp duty as a charterparty, there shall be charged and paid thereon the stamp duty of 6d., and it shall not be lawful under any pretence whatever for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to stamp, after the same shall have been signed, any charterparty, or any such document as aforesaid which, after the expiration of one calendar month from the passing of this act, shall be made on or by means of any printed form, or on a form which shall be partly printed, and if any person after the period aforesaid shall make or sign any charterparty, or other such document as aforesaid, which shall be printed or partly printed, and shall not be duly stamped for denoting the duty hereby charged thereon before the same shall be signed, he shall forfeit the sum of 50l.; provided always, that if any charterparty or other such document as aforesaid, which shall be wholly in writing shall be brought to be stamped within the respective times herein-after mentioned after the same shall bear date and shall have been first signed, the commissioners shall stamp the same on the following terms—that is to say, if within fourteen days, on payment of the duty and 4s. 6d., and if after that time, and within one calendar month after such date and first signing, then on payment of the duty and the sum of 10l.; but after the expiration of the last-mentioned period it shall not be lawful to stamp such charterparty or other document as aforesaid on any pretence whatever; provided always, that if any charterparty, whether printed or written, shall be first signed by any party thereto out of the United Kingdom, such charterparty being unstamped, it shall be lawful for any party thereto within ten days after it shall have been received in this kingdom, and before the same shall have been signed by any person here, to affix thereto an adhesive stamp denoting the duty chargeable thereon, and to cancel such stamp by writing across the same his name and the date when he shall so affix such stamp, and thereupon such charterparty shall be deemed to be duly stamped."

On the preamble of the bill,

Mr. Ayrton pointed out the growing necessity for a bill to consolidate the whole of the laws relating to the Exchequer, in consequence of the yearly alterations in the Stamp Acts. Under present circumstances, it was scarcely possible to find out the actual state of the law upon the subject without wading through innumerable clauses in various acts, and, therefore, he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take into consideration the propriety of introducing such a bill on the assembling of the new Parliament.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer felt the force of what had been said, and thought it would be very desirable that they should have a consolidation of the Stamp Acts.

Sir C. O'Loughlen directed the Chancellor of the Exchequer's attention to the fact, that ships might be sold, assigned, or mortgaged, without making any return to the revenue by means of stamps, and the law even provided an admirable and cheap machinery for doing so. It was for the right hon. gentleman to consider whether the stamp duty should not be extended to the transfer of ships.

Mr. Scully complained that in Ireland, in transactions with regard to land, persons had to pay double stamp duty, as compared with the duty in England. In England they had to pay only a 10s. duty; in Ireland they had to pay an ad valorem duty besides. That double duty seriously interfered with the transfer of land in Ireland.

Mr. Haufield said, that with regard to settlements, a gentleman had written to him stating that, in addition to the 5s. duty on every 100l., he had also to pay 1l. 15s. for the deed.

The Attorney-General said, if anybody wished to have the decision of the commissioners with regard to the proper stamp to be put on the deed, he could go to them; and if he was not satisfied with their decision, he could go to the Court of Exchequer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, if his friends furnished him with the particulars of the several cases, he would see what could be done.

The preamble was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be reported.

LAW OF EVIDENCE, &c., BILL.

On clause 1,

Sir F. Kelly said, two exceptions of quasi civil cases had been inserted in Lord Denman's Act. With the first of these exceptions—cases for breach of promise of marriage—clause 1 of the present bill was intended to deal. He did not deny that considerable objection might reasonably be made to the examination of the parties to this class of action; but he thought that the proviso of the member for Leominster, which would provide that there must be a promise in writing, would go far to remove those objections.

Sir G. Bowyer was afraid the clause would lead to a good many marriages which would not be productive of domestic happiness. If the clause of the hon. member for Leominster should be adopted, he thought it would nullify the clause altogether.

Mr. Roebuck said the arguments of his hon. and learned friend against the clause were just those used against Lord Brougham's Bill, the merit of which, by the way, belonged not to Lord Brougham but to Jeremy Bentham. Who was the party most likely to be injured in these cases? Clearly the woman; the man was nearly always the deceiver. His hon. and learned friend seemed to think that every man who found himself alone with a modest woman would be in danger, and would be said to have promised marriage. Now, his hon. and learned friend did not know enough of women. There would always be the safeguard of a jury, and if a young woman said that his hon. and learned friend had made her a proposal when he was alone with her, no jury would believe that young woman on her oath. He repeated that the wrong was invariably done by the man; he did not believe in such an article as a designing woman. As to the proviso suggested by Mr. Hardy, that the promise should be in writing, that would be an alteration of the substantive law, and, if adopted, there would be very few valid promises of marriage whatever.

Mr. G. Hardy pitied the unfortunate man who ever defended an action for breach of promise, when persons like his hon. and learned friend were on the jury. He could not admit that men were always deceivers, and women never; and certainly juries did not deal out anything like equal justice between them. The other day a lady brought an action against a gentleman who was lame, and unable to take care of himself, and though her position would have been that of a nurse rather than of a wife, she recovered heavy damages for the loss of that position. In another case, a lady with 4000l. or 5000l. a year made a solemn promise of marriage to a gentleman, and when he, being jilted, brought his action for the damage he had suffered by losing the material comforts he supposed he was going to obtain, he was dismissed with a farthing damages, amid shouts of contempt.

Was this a reciprocal action, and if so, was it treated fairly by juries? He would treat these promises in the way which promises of a much less serious character were treated under the Statute of Frauds. Because people were apt to construe that into a promise which was never meant to be one, the Statute of Frauds required that certain promises should be in writing; and if there was any one class of cases in which this precaution became necessary, it was in cases where marriage was in question, and promises were extorted, or imaginary promises were framed, by mothers and sisters anxious for the match, out of innocent conversations. No doubt, juries very much resembled in feeling his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Roebuck). When a young and pretty lady was set before them as having been deluded, there was no holding them in. He remembered hearing an old gentleman, who had been a barrister in India, tell the story of a Circassian slave, who had murdered the master of a harem there. This counsel had to defend her. It was a bad case; but he said, "Put her in her best dress, the more transparent the better; set her opposite the jury, and I will answer for the result." And the result was exactly what he predicted. She had stabbed the man, but the jury pardoned the crime for the sake of the interesting woman they saw before them. So in the case of an action for breach of promise. A young and interesting woman would get damages; but if a man was ever so young and interesting, he got no damages, but had to pay heavy costs, and get scouted besides. For his part, he thought this action might well be abolished, for he did not believe in the broken hearts of young ladies, who, directly they got a dowry in the shape of damages, got somebody else to console them. If, however, you must have the action, why not treat it as a serious matter? Why should not these promises be placed on the same footing as promises under the Statute of Frauds? In a class of cases with which magistrates at petty sessions were very familiar, material corroborative evidence of the woman's statement was required, and the law was altered specially to enforce that, in consequence of the iniquities which had been perpetrated. The alteration which was proposed was not to create new evidence of an old kind; it created, in fact, an entirely new action, and if it were carried, a class of cases would come into the courts as actions for breach of promise of marriage, which were now settled before magistrates at petty sessions. He did not intend to oppose the clause; indeed, he should not vote upon it at all, but if it were carried, he should move the addition of the following proviso:—"Provided always, that no such action shall be hereafter brought, unless the promise be in writing, signed by both the parties." It was a mistake to suppose, that when a promise was made, the young lady must sit down on the spot, and write it out, and then call on the gentleman to sign it. This was not the case, nor was it the case under the Statute of Frauds. If the promise could be made out from any number of letters between the parties, that was sufficient.

The Solicitor-General agreed that this was a very exceptional kind of action. Why it happened he could not say; but his experience in courts of justice was, that in actions for breaches of promise of marriage the women had it all their own way, and the men had no chance. The lady was well got up, placed in a conspicuous place, and the attention of the jury directed to her, and, of course, she was generally in tears. If she were placed in the witness-box and cried under cross-examination, as they always did, it would be all over with the man. The jury, to show their chivalry, their admiration for the fair sex, and their contempt for their own, would immediately return a verdict for her. If this amendment of the law were sanctioned, it would be found that a certain class of attorneys would come into court with a crop of actions for breach of promise, which no single man could stand against except he had the advantage of the hon. and learned member for Dundalk, and could protect himself by the vow of celibacy.

On the question that the clause as amended be agreed to, The committee divided, and the numbers were,—

For the clause	27
Against it	86
Majority	59

The clause was accordingly rejected.

On clause 2, providing that parties to any suit instituted in consequence of adultery might offer themselves as witnesses on their own behalf,

Sir F. Kelly said, that the clause allowed parties to offer themselves as witnesses, but there was no power given by it to compel them to come forward to give evidence. The law at present was full of anomalies and inconveniences, to remedy which this clause had been framed, and he hoped that it would meet with the approval of the committee. It was monstrous that a lady should have to sit in court, and hear herself accused of adultery, and circumstances urged against her which she could explain or contradict, did not the law prohibit her from doing so.

The Attorney-General said, the hon. and learned gentleman proposed to give a power of offering evidence to either party in cases of adultery, but not in the ordinary way, nor subject to the ordinary rules of evidence. The parties were to be competent, but not compellable, to give evidence. He must say that he looked with some apprehension at what would be the practical working of the clause. But for the existing anomalies, and the high authority of the learned judge who presided over the particular court where these questions were most frequently raised, he should have hesitated to accept such an alteration in the law of evidence. But, if the law was to be altered, why should it be in a manner that was without precedent? He would press that question upon the committee more particularly on the very ground which appeared to him most to favour the change. Under the law, as it stood, we had an anomalous state of things, that in causes not originally founded on charge of adultery, but in which charges of that nature arose collaterally, or by way of defence, the husband or wife was compellable to give evidence. If it should be determined to disregard the great accessions to the present gross scandals that would be likely to arise from making husband and wife enter the witness-box to give a history of their whole lives, at least they should put the law upon a footing that would be free from inconsistencies and anomalies. He could not consent to the words in the clause, "Shall be allowed, if he or she shall think fit."

Sir F. Kelly said the learned judge who had been referred to entertained a strong objection to compelling either husband or wife to prove his or her adultery. It was contrary to a fundamental principle of our law to make any person compellable to give evidence criminating himself. He, therefore, proposed a proviso to this effect:—"Provided always, that no person so competent shall be compellable to be called as a witness to give evidence in any issue which shall raise the question whether such person has been guilty of adultery."

Mr. Hunt asked how the hon. and learned member construed that proposition with the fifth clause, under which a person might be compelled in the course of his cross-examination to criminate himself.

Sir F. Kelly said that while a person would not be compelled by the bill to place himself in a position in which he would have to criminate himself, yet if he voluntarily tendered himself as a witness, he must submit to a cross-examination which might have that effect.

Mr. Ayrton thought the opinion of the committee ought to be taken on the clause and the proviso separately.

The proviso was then put and negatived.

On the question that the clause stand part of the bill,

Mr. Selwyn rose to move its omission. He did so for the reasons so well stated by the Attorney-General, and because he believed the clause, if adopted, would aggravate the scandals connected with these trials in the Divorce Court.

Mr. Malins on the same grounds opposed the clause. The scandals in the Divorce Court were already sufficiently great, but they would be infinitely greater if they had wives and husbands appearing there to swear against each other. As to persons having it in their own option to tender themselves as witnesses or not, if they refused to do so, would not that be construed as an admission of their guilt? The existence of the Divorce Court was one of the greatest public calamities.

Mr. Walter felt some difficulty as a layman in offering an opinion on a subject of that kind; but he must take leave to say that he thought the arguments urged against that clause were by no means satisfactory. In a question of that nature what they had to was, not whether more or less scandal or disgrace would be produced by the operation of that clause, but whether or not it would facilitate the ends of justice, and tend to prevent innocent persons from suffering cruelty and wrong. These divorce cases were in themselves scandals, that was an evil inherent in their very nature, and it could not be helped.

The clause was then put and negatived.

The bill was then withdrawn, and the House resumed.

Monday, June 19.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT COMMISSION.

Mr. Herbert wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it was probable that the report of the Capital Punishment Commission would be presented to Parliament.

Sir G. Grey said he believed that the report was not yet ready, and was still under the consideration of the commission.

FORFEITURE FOR TREASON AND FELONY BILL.

In reply to Mr. C. Forster,

The Attorney-General said it would be impossible to proceed with the bill during the present session. He was anxious to give effect to the engagements which he had entered into on the subject last year, but the difficulties experienced with regard to the working machinery of the bill had been found too great, and it was now too late in the session to overcome them.

CONTRACTS FOR HIGHWAYS.—STAMP DUTY.

Mr. Trevelyan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether contracts for the maintenance and repair of highways were liable to the stamp duty of 1*l.* 15*s.*; and, if so, whether he would consider the advisability of reducing the duty.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, there was some doubt as to the state of the law upon the subject; he thought, however, there was no reason why the contracts should be so liable. The Government were, therefore, of opinion that they should be put on a more favourable footing, and in considering the Inland Revenue Bill this evening, he should move a clause to the effect that they should not be chargeable with any other duty than the 6*d.* stamp duty.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. Lowe asked the noble lord the chairman of the Patent Law Commission, what steps it was proposed to take with regard to the report of that commission.

Lord Stanley said the Patent Law Commission appointed three years ago was confined as regarded the scope of its inquiry. It was not a commission to inquire into the principle upon which the patent laws were founded, but simply into the working of the existing laws, and to suggest any amendments which might be made in the working of those laws. The report of that commission was before the House, and, as the House was aware, they had suggested many amendments in detail. But he was bound to say that, having had the subject under consideration now for nearly three years, having heard a great variety of evidence upon it, and being compelled to consider it in all its bearings, the effect of that inquiry on his mind had been to raise a very serious doubt as to the utility of patent laws at all. He was not the only member of the commission upon whom that effect had been produced. His hon. and learned friend the member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns), who was not now present, had authorised him to say that in that expression of opinion he entirely concurred, and he might say the same for the hon. member for Bradford. ("Hear, hear," from Mr. Forster). That being the case, he should feel some difficulty in proposing to the House, either in the present or any future session, those amendments of detail which had been embodied in the report of the commission. The preliminary question, in his opinion, for the House to try was this, whether they meant to have a patent law at all. If the House came to a decision that they intended to retain the patent law, then he should confidently recommend the amendments which the commission had proposed as better qualified than any others in their opinion to meet the inevitable inconvenience which arises from the continuance of the law. But the House ought first to have an opportunity fairly and deliberately of deciding upon that larger question which had not been submitted to the Patent Law Commission, namely, whether it was expedient that patents for inventions should continue to be a part of the law.

The vote of 200,00*l.*, the proportion of the total sum of 703,000*l.*, required for this year for the purchase of lands and houses for a site for the new courts of justice and offices, was agreed to.

Tuesday, June 20.

COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION (JUDGES' SALARIES).

The House went into committee.

Mr. F. Peel proposed a resolution to enable the Treasury to pay out of the Consolidated Fund an addition of 300*l.* a year each to the salaries of county court judges in England.

Mr. Augustus Smith objected to the proposed increase, and said it had been found by a return that the judges whose salaries had been raised to 1500*l.* had not been the most deserving so far as their duties were concerned. There were nineteen judges who sat in their courts only from 150 to 200 days in the year, and thirty-five who sat only from 100 to 150, and one who did not actually sit 100 days. If this increase in the salary should be made, those holding other legal appointments of a similar character would be making application to be placed on the same footing. He feared also that the measure would be detrimental to the profession itself.

Mr. Longfield regretted that the old principle of fees had not been retained, because some judges would now be getting 300*l.* a year for hearing ten extra cases, while others would have perhaps 300 additional cases.

Mr. F. Peel said, there was a great objection to the payment of county court judges by fees. It would be provided that any judge appointed hereafter should not have more than 1500*l.* a year. The highest sum now was 1600*l.*, and this 300*l.* would raise it to 1800*l.*

Mr. Ayrton.—It should be understood, that if the jurisdiction in bankruptcy were extended to the county court judges, as recommended by a select committee, no further claim for an increase of salary should be made.

Mr. Henley said, if the House were going to give additional duties, for which a sum equal to one-fourth of the income in many cases was to be paid, then it might be assumed that only three-fourths of the time of the county court judges was at present occupied. He urged that some revision should be made with reference to the imprisonment of poor persons for debt in the ordinary gaols for criminals, which richer persons took care to avoid.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the right hon. gentleman was far from correct in assuming that the time of the county court judges was only three-fourths occupied. The duties now to be added would, it was thought, be equal to one-fourth of their present labours. The remuneration to the civil service of this country was generally liberal, and with respect to the legal profession he thought it was more than liberal, and very large.

Sir C. O'Loughlin thought a source of income should be created by a system of stamp duties in county courts, such as existed in Ireland, where the county courts were in consequence a much less expense to the country than in England.

After a few words from Mr. Lewis, the resolution was agreed to, and ordered to be reported.

The House then resumed.

On the motion of Mr. F. Peel, the order for going into committee on the Ulster Canal Transfer Bill was discharged, and the Trusts Administration (Scotland) Bill and Record of Title (Ireland) Bill read a third time, and passed.

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

Some amendments in this bill were considered, and agreed to.

Wednesday, June 21.

MERCHANT SHIPPING DISPUTES BILL.

Mr. Denman, in moving the second reading of this bill, explained that it had been drawn up under the auspices of the Newcastle Chamber of Commerce, and had been approved at a large meeting of delegates from the associated chambers of commerce throughout the country.

Mr. Headlam corroborated the statements, that the bill had originated with the Newcastle Chamber of Commerce, and had received the approval of the associated chambers of commerce throughout the country.

Mr. M. Gibson admitted that the subject was one which was deserving of the fullest consideration of the Board of Trade. If, however, his hon. and learned friend would allow the matter to rest for the present session, he would undertake that it should receive during the recess the fullest consideration.

After some observations by the Solicitor-General, Mr. Moor, and Mr. Cave, the order for the second reading of the bill was discharged.

The Railways Clauses Bill was, after an animated discussion, withdrawn.

The report upon the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction (Judges Salaries) was brought up and received.

WELSBY and EDWARD BEAVAN, Esqrs., Barristers at Law.

"The principal branches of the Law are arranged alphabetically, and under each is collected all the Statutes relating to it, with explanatory notes. Besides the easy access afforded by the alphabetical arrangement of the subjects, a very copious general Index supplies the means of ready reference to all the subjects of lesser importance to which the various Statutes are directed."

"We could not say more for this great work by any words of approbation than by this short description of it. It is an admirable design admirably executed."—Law Times, May 13, 1855.

"In the debate on the proposed consolidation of the Statutes, on the 9th February, 1854, Lord Campbell said, 'that the Statutes at large extended to about fifty volumes folio, but all the Statutes which were usually required by lawyers for reference might be found in three octavo volumes, compiled by his learned friend Mr. Welsby. When he (Lord Campbell) was upon the Bench, he always had this work by him, and no Statutes were ever referred to by the Bar which he could not find in it.'"

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 1, 1865.

THE imperfection of that branch of our law popularly known by the name of "magistrates' law" (using that term as applied to the branch of law, and not to the actual decisions of magistrates in quarter or petty sessions in applying the law), are manifold, and are well known to all those whose practice makes them conversant with the intricacies, inconveniences, and absurdities which are the natural offspring of such imperfection. To one of the sources of this imperfection, with its consequences, we wish to draw attention; and we wish to point our notice of the blot by a late notable example. The source of imperfection to which we wish in our present article to direct our readers is, that system of legislation by which appeals are given, either from the decisions of magistrates or in cases which in due course would come before them, to any of the Superior Courts at Westminster, without any further appeal in the matter. The consequence of this system is, that a conflict of cases often arises, for the following reason:—Many points arising on appeal are, in the nature of things, intricate, open to much doubt, difficult of solution, and (with all respect to the learned judges) refer to matters somewhat out of the general beat of the practice of many of those on the bench, and therefore, inevitably, among the judges there must arise a difference of opinion respecting them. An appeal comes before one court, and that Court, often with great difficulty and doubt, not unfrequently with a difference of opinion between the members of the court, gives a particular decision. The same case, or one which as a logical consequence would follow it, arises again, and instead of an appeal to the Court which has given the previous decision, an appeal is made to one of the other Superior Courts. The case comes on for argument; the former decision is candidly pointed out by the counsel, who would be out of court if it were to be received in the ordinary way, as a decision by a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction; but the following doctrine is prayed in aid—the doctrine, that though where a decision is open to revision by a higher tribunal, it is a binding authority on co-ordinate Courts; yet, where this power of revision is wanting, each Court is entitled to act on its own opinion, and, after a careful and respectful consideration of the former decision of another co-ordinate Court, to give a decision directly adverse to it, should their opinion be different. This doctrine is acknowledged, accepted, and acted on. The consequence is, that on some points we get decisions standing in our reports, sometimes directly and totally adverse to each other, sometimes distinguished by distinctions which are really nothing more than evasions, the offspring of inter-judicial courtesy, sometimes founded on reasonings which conflict at every step, cannot be reconciled, and, if fairly followed out, must be productive in various other cases, and applications of them, to diametrically opposite conclusions.

A case has lately arisen, "to point our moral and adorn our tale;" and we especially draw attention to it, as it affects a most important branch of our magisterial law—the law of poor rates, and involves principles which lie at the very foundation of our rating system, and may be productive of the most seriously different results, and the most disastrous and far-spread litigation, if persons attempt in different courts to enlist the two divergent decisions to which we are now about to draw attention. In the year 1854 the case of Allison v. The Churchwardens, &c. of Monkwearmouth (23 L. J., M. C., 177) came on on appeal before the Court of Queen's Bench. The case was as follows:—A brewery and premises, together with the goodwill and trade of certain public houses, subject to the rents theretofore received for the said public houses, were leased for seventeen years to A., yielding, and paying for and in respect of the brewery and premises, the clear yearly rent of 300*l.*, and for and in respect of the fixtures, &c., the yearly rent of 30*l.*, and for and in respect of the goodwill and trade of all the public houses, the yearly rent of 150*l.* A. occupied the brewery and premises, and the public houses, thirty-three in number, which were situate in different places apart from the brewery, were let by A. to separate tenants, at rents about equal to the amount paid by A. to his landlord. The tenants of the public houses, as they were bound to do under an agreement, purchased from A. at the brewery all the malt liquors, &c. consumed in their houses, and each tenant was separately rated to the poor rate. Without the restriction as regards the purchase of malt liquors, &c., a higher rental would have been given for the public houses. It was held by Campbell, C. J., and Crompton, J., first, that the 150*l.* paid for the goodwill of the public houses was to be taken into account in estimating the rateable value of A.'s occupation of the brewery and premises; secondly, that A. was not entitled to claim a deduction equal in amount as an outgoing necessary to the obtaining by the brewery of the profit derived from the trade of the public houses. Erle, J., however, held a different opinion. The two learned judges who constituted the majority of the Court held, that the case fell within the two well-known old cases as to the soke-mill and the canteen; while Erle, J., considered that the former of those cases depended on the fact, that the millstone was a legal appurtenance to the mill, and not the creature of a mere temporary personal contract, as in the case before him; and that the decision in the latter case turned on the advantage of situation, and was so distinguishable.

Quite lately the following case arose:—Certain breweries had public houses bound to them by contracts similar to those in Allison v. Monkwearmouth, some of such public houses being in the same parish as the brewery to which they were attached, some not. The overseers of the parish in which the breweries were situated rated the breweries and public houses without reference to their contracts; but the assessment committee of the union in which the parish was situated (where the matter came before them, under the Union Committee Assessment Act of 1861) raised the rating of the breweries in consequence of the contracts, without, however, touching the rating of the public houses. The question of the propriety of this course was brought before the Common Pleas, where Erle, C. J. (the dissentient judge in the former case in the Queen's Bench), presided, having been transferred from the Queen's Bench in the interval. The case was heard before the Chief Justice, and Justices Byles and Smith. Here, again, a division of opinion occurred, resulting in a decision exactly the reverse of that come to in the case of Allison v. Monkwearmouth—the Chief Justice and Justice Smith thinking that the overseers were right, whilst Justice Byles thought they were wrong; and in giving their decisions, the two former made the following observations on Allison v. Monkwearmouth:—The Chief Justice said—"I now proceed to the case of Allison v. Monkwearmouth. The facts of that case seem to me to be materially different from those here stated, and the statute here to be construed is different from the statute there in question, and therefore it is not necessary to decide whether an opinion given by a Court, by way of advice, from which there is no appeal, is as binding on co-ordinate Courts as a judgment would be, where the same question is sent up to a second Court for its opinion. I should think not. It seems to me that each Court is in such case original, and bound to give its own judgment, just as, on a motion for a writ of habeas corpus, each tribunal must give its own decision, without being swayed by other tribunals. But, as already observed, it may be that we are not called on here to say that any former case should be overruled.

"In Allison v. Monkwearmouth the title deeds and leases were produced by the brewer, and the facts relevant to the rating of the brewery for the supposed profit from the tie were taken therefrom. Those facts were, that Sir Marmaduke Williamson was owner of a brewery, of which the rateable value by itself was 350*l.*, and thirty-three public houses, of which the rateable value is not given. These public houses he had let, with contracts to take beer, at moneyed rents, amounting in the aggregate to 150*l.* He then leased to Allison for seventeen years the brewery, with the goodwill of these public houses, as it is called, subject to the payment of the rents theretofore received by Williamson—that is, yielding, in respect of the brewery and fixtures, 350*l.*, and in respect of the public houses, 150*l.* This sum of 150*l.* thus described as rent is found to have been in substance the rents of the public houses, collected by Allison for Williamson during the existing leases. When the tenancies changed, Allison let to the new tenants, and continued to receive during the term the same moneyed rent from those public houses, amounting to about the sum of 150*l.* per annum, which he paid to Williamson, under the above-mentioned covenant. The lease of the goodwill of the public houses is thus shewn by the case to have been in effect a lease of the public houses. The Court held, that Allison was liable to be rated for this sum of 160*l.*, being the amount of the rents so received. The case also finds that all tenants were assessed for their public houses, but the value is not stated. These being the facts, the judgment affirming the rate on the brewer for the amount of rents collected by him, and paid over to the superior landlord, has the singular effect of holding that a rent collector may be rateable for the amount of rents which he collects, where the given relation of brewer and publican is found to exist.

"The case is also singular in this—that although, as a general rule, the province of the Courts here is confined to deciding on rateability only, and does not extend to deciding on amount, yet the Court, in thus holding the brewer liable to be rated for the rents collected, refused permission to go into the question of the cost of the production of the supposed rateable value of 150*l.*, and assumed that the covenant to pay that sum as rent of the brewhouse was conclusive of rateable value, although the deed shewed it was rent collected. The case also found that Mr. Allison rented other public houses, not of a brewer landlord, which he sublet to publicans with the contract for beer. The notion of rating him for the rent he received from those publicans seems not to have been attempted; but if he was liable for those he rented of Williamson, it is difficult to say why he was not liable for those rented of others. If the attempt had been made to rate him for every public house under contract with him to take beer, it would have been the rating of a profit of trade; and yet the profit from beer supplied to Williamson's public houses was the same profit of trade as that from beer supplied to other public houses.

"Furthermore, there is a sound distinction between that case and the present, on the ground that the assessment lists relate to the whole union, and all the tenements are at once to be assessed. Under the former acts, before the Union Assessment Act, there was a defect in deciding appeals on rates, because only one tenement was the subject of the judgment at a time; and in apportioning the rateable value of two or more portions of the same rateable subject in two or more parishes, the injustice of doubly rating the same rateable subject might be inflicted in the apportioning process, unless all the portions were disposed of at once. Accordingly, in Allison's case, although it appeared that the tenants of the public houses were rated as well as the tenants of the brewery, yet the Court had no power of inquiring, and did not inquire, whether the public houses were rated at their full value, and whether the rating Allison for the rents which they paid to him, were not in reality a double rating of these public houses, that is, once on the tenant and again on Allison.

"Here the overseers have rated all the public houses as well as the brewery according to the principle of the Assessment Acts; and according to those principles the publican would have to pay a rate both on the lower money payment and the higher beer charge which he pays to the brewer, his landlord, under the contract.

"There is no suggestion that any further value is created by this relation of landlord and tenant. If the suggestion was made, it certainly could not be ascertained without taking an account of the profits of the beer trade, involving an account of losses by insolvency and otherwise; and so it would be made apparent that it was an attempt to rate a profit of trade.

"If the doctrine is established, that the supposed profit from a publican tenant, taking beer by contract, is rateable upon the brewer, the question would arise, why the same profit arising by reason of a publican debtor contracting to take beer from the brewer creditor should not also be assessed. The tie is created as well by a loan secured by a bill of sale as by a covenant in a lease, that is, unless the publican can pay off the loan, he may be broken up, as it is called, at any time; and yet the attempt to make such a profit of trade rateable has not been made. It is also clear, that a brewer differs, not in respect of his liability, from a butcher, a baker, or the like. If the brewer landlord is to be rated as Allison was, other tradesmen landlords influencing custom by letting retail tenements with contracts for custom, ought to be rated; but such an item of rateable value has never been recognised.

"For these reasons, the case of Allison v. Monkwearmouth seems to me distinguishable from the present. In the judgment delivered by me in that case, I endeavoured to distinguish the right of the occupier of a soke-mill, derived from immemorial custom to the servitude of all within the soke, and the right of the occupier of a canteen placed in a populous locality, from a right derived under such a contract as that in Allison's case. I refer to the reasons there given, which appear to me to have more force when applied to an assessment list, fixing the rateable value of each rateable subject in the union on the principles above explained; and I will not increase the length of this judgment by repeating what I am reported there to have said.

"I will only add, as to the soke-mill, that the prescriptive rights of the miller of that mill to the multure from the inhabitants of the soke, is a realty affecting the fee-simple of the whole locality, and the immediate profit fixed by the custom is subject to no risk of trade, if the miller may take his toll in kind; whereas the right of a landlord to sue on the contract for taking beer, is a personalty affecting only the persons of the contracting parties; and the profit therefrom varies in proportion to the skill of the contracting parties, and is subject to all the risks of trade from insolvency, dishonesty, and the like. If this be correct, the profit to the mill from the prescription is rateable, and the profit to the brewer from the contract for beer is not."

And Smith, J., said—"The facts of the case of Allison v. Monkwearmouth differ in some respects from the present, and the question of reducing the rateable value of the public houses was not in that case before the Court for decision. Here we have to decide that question, and to decide it upon the provisions of the recent statute. Notwithstanding the respect which I feel for the opinion of the three learned judges who formed the majority of the Court, their decision, which could not be appealed from, ought not, I think, to be conclusive in this case."

With respect to the preferability of the two decisions, we for our present purpose have nothing to do.

We will only remark on those portions of the judgments which we have given, that none of the elaborate distinctions of the Chief Justice were taken by him in Allison v. Monkwearmouth, and that, by the Union Assessment Committee Act, the old principles of rating are in terms preserved.

And this being so, we cannot but think that we here have a good illustration of the defect which we are reprobating, and the desirability of a remedy. This remedy may be provided, either by giving an appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, or by restricting the appeals to some one particular court, as in the case of appeals from the decisions of revising barristers; and we leave to our readers now to consider which of these two courses is the proper one.

MR. THOMAS COLLETT SANDARS, of Lincoln's-inn, has been appointed to succeed the late J. G. Phillimore, Q. C., as Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History to the Inns of Court. The profession, and through them the country, are deeply interested in the administration of the important trust which the Benchers of the Inns of Court have delegated to the Council of Legal Education. The office of reader is practically, though not in form, for life, and the duty of the Council is obviously to make a safe appointment if they can. If all the candidates are untried, the selection will necessarily be speculative, and must be made upon the fairest estimate and balance of their known performances and their testimonials. But, if among them there is one who has devoted himself to, and gained special distinction in, the very subject in question, and who is otherwise unobjectionable, the Council, acting on behalf of the profession and the public, have no right to pass him over, in favour of any one who is merely recommended as likely to do well. Now all that is known of Mr. Sandars is, that he has respectably edited the Institutes of Justinian—a subject as remote from English Constitutional Law as any that can engage the attention of a lawyer. We have nothing to urge against the appointment of that gentleman to the chair of Constitutional Law, except the facts—most material in an appointment for life—that his fitness for it remains to be proved, and that there was another candidate whose fitness was unquestionable and notorious. Instead of taking the chance of making a lucky hit, the Council had the opportunity of selecting a gentleman, certainly as well qualified in respect of general attainments, character, and experience in academic tuition, but who had also established his claim to this particular appointment, by long and laborious study of English Constitutional Law and Legal History. We mean of course Mr. Homersham Cox, whose Treatise on the Institutions of the English Government has a European reputation, and is known not only as a most learned and elaborate, but also as a most readable book—the very book which an accomplished reader on Constitutional Law would desire to put into the hands of his more advanced pupils. We know that we are far from being singular in thinking, that in this instance the Council appear to have acted as if they were dispensing patronage rather than discharging a public trust.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday, June 27.

The Inland Revenue Bill was read a second time.
The Carriers Act Amendment Bill and the Foreign Jurisdiction Act Amendment Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday, June 23.

COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION BILL.

On the motion that the House resolve into committee on this bill,

Mr. Ayrton moved, that it be an instruction to the committee to assimilate the Sheriff's Court of the city of London in all respects to a county court. He said that the royal commission in 1859, and a committee of that House in 1861, reported against the maintenance of this special jurisdiction in the city of London. It was difficult to conceive anything more inconvenient or extravagant than the present state of things. While county courts were set up in all directions to administer a uniform system of procedure, there existed in the heart of the metropolis a court of different procedure, and of an exceptional character, and an actual profit was made by the city of London from fees in the administration of justice in that court. That profit formed an accumulated fund, available, probably, for those entertainments in which the corporation delighted.

The Attorney-General could not agree to the proposed instruction. It would be making the bill the occasion for a contest between the Government and the city of London, which would preclude the hope of passing the measure in the present session.

Mr. Ayrton, not wishing to endanger the passing of the bill, withdrew his motion.

The House then went into committee on the bill.

On clause 1, giving jurisdiction in equity to county courts in certain suits and matters relating to amounts or values not exceeding 500*l.*,

Sir C. O'Loughlin said, he entertained great doubts whether the jurisdiction proposed to be given to county court judges was not far too great, and whether it would not tend to clog the working of their courts, thereby injuring, rather than benefiting the public interests. Were it not so near the close of the session, he should have felt disposed to move that the maximum of 500*l.* should be reduced to 200*l.*

Mr. Cheetham supported the clause as it stood, and, indeed, thought that the limit might have been safely fixed at 1000*l.*

Sir M. Farguhar also approved the clause.

The Attorney-General said, that the extent of the jurisdiction proposed to be conferred by the bill had been carefully considered, and he believed it might safely be intrusted to the judges of these courts.

Mr. Murray hoped that the limit would not be fixed below 500*l.*

After a few words from Mr. Augustus Smith,

Sir C. O'Loughlin explained, that he did not question the competency of the county court judges, but feared that these new duties would interfere with the small cause business.

The clause was then agreed to, as were also clauses 2 and 3.

Clause 4 (relating to the Sheriff's Court) was expunged.

Clauses up to 13 were agreed to.

Upon clause 14,

The Attorney-General proposed an amendment to allow the county court judges, with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor, to select any other month than that of September for their annual vacation; which, after discussion, was agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

In answer to Mr. Murray,

The Attorney-General said he would, before the report, consider the propriety of granting a direct appeal to the superior court. He also proposed a clause instead of clause 4, giving to the City Small Debts Court jurisdiction in all matters over which a metropolitan county court has jurisdiction, which, with an addition moved by Mr. Murray, requiring that the judge and officers of the city court shall conform to the rules and orders made under the authority of this act, was agreed to.

Colonel Wilson Patten moved a clause to follow clause 18, reserving the right of appeal to the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

Mr. Cheetham, Mr. Bazley, and Mr. Hadfield supported the clause.

The Attorney-General said that the bill did not interfere with any of the existing rights of the Court of Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster. The proposal would deprive one part of the country of a right of appeal enjoyed in other portions of England.

After some remarks by Mr. C. Turner and Mr. Ayrton,

The Attorney-General said he should not object to the clause if words requiring the assent of both parties were introduced.

The clause, with the modification suggested by Mr. Ayrton, was eventually agreed to, as were also clauses to the effect, that the registrar of the Bloomsbury County Court of Middlesex, not being an attorney or solicitor, be entitled to retire from his office with compensation; that the act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and any act amending or altering the same should be construed together; and that the salary of T. Rodgers, Esq., as joint registrar of the county court of Sheffield, be 700*l.* a year.

The preamble was then agreed to, and the bill passed through committee.

Monday, June 26

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

This bill, as amended, was considered, and words limiting the right of appeal were added to the 25th clause.

COUNTY COURTS EQUITABLE JURISDICTION BILL.

This bill, as amended, was likewise considered.

Mr. Henley said the power of commitment under this bill was unlimited, and as the position of county court debtors at present was almost a final one, he hoped the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State would take care that the operation of the measure was surrounded with proper safeguards.

Sir G. Grey was not certain that all the persons committed under this bill would be in the position of county court debtors, though some undoubtedly would be. He would look into the matter, however; the treatment, it was right to add, was defined by rules made by the Home Office, and not under an act of Parliament.

On clause 20, which imposed upon the judge in certain cases the duty of settling the terms of appeals,

Mr. Murray stated objections which he entertained to this provision, and moved that it be struck out.

Mr. Malins also thought this was an attempt to reintroduce a pernicious and abolished system. The same practice existed formerly in bankruptcy, and he had seen two days spent before the judge in an attempt to settle the terms of an appeal.

The Attorney-General, in deference to the opinions which had been expressed, was quite willing to allow the question of appeal to remain at large, and see how the system worked.

Clause 20 was then omitted, and the remaining clauses were agreed to.

The Poor-law Board Continuance Bill, as amended, was considered.

RAILWAY DEBENTURES, &c. REGISTRY BILL.

On the order of the day for the second reading of this bill, Lord Naas said that the bill had come down from the Lords; but as it appeared that it would meet with considerable opposition in that House, its promoters had no wish to proceed with it during the present session.

The order of the day was then discharged, and the bill withdrawn.

PUBLIC-HOUSE CLOSING ACT (1864) AMENDMENT BILL.

The Lords' amendments to this bill were considered, and agreed to.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

The Lords' amendments to this bill were considered, and agreed to.

Tuesday, June 27.

The County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Longfield, on moving the adjournment of the House, called attention to the report of the committee on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, observing, that he considered it to be his painful duty to bring this grave matter before the House. After some preliminary remarks upon the Edmunds case, he proceeded to detail the circumstances of the Leeds case, as developed in the report of the committee, remarking upon the discrepancies it indicated in the evidence, and especially the extraordinary and hopeless contradictions between Mr. Miller and the Lord Chancellor, and upon the singular admissions made by the latter, the keeper of the Queen's conscience. He complained of the stain upon the administration of justice by the proofs of the highest officer of the Crown having connived at the grant of pensions to improper objects, and that such a person should still be Lord Chancellor. He concluded by putting certain questions to the Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General, after adverting to the difficult position in which he was placed, observed that the evidence in the case was not yet before the House; that when it was, and not till then, the House would be in a condition to form an opinion upon it, and those who had to meet the case would have the necessary materials for their defence. He complained that Mr. Longfield, who had drawn his facts from the report of the committee, did not adopt the conclusions of the committee, who had acquitted the Lord Chancellor of everything except haste and want of caution. He pointed out facts which shewed that his Lordship could have had no improper motive in what he had done, and he censured the spirit in which Mr. Longfield had brought the matter before the House. In reply to the inquiries put to him, he stated the course which the Government deemed it to be their duty to take. They would wait for the evidence, and lay it before the law officers of the Crown, in order to ascertain whether there were sufficient grounds for proceeding against any of the parties for corruption.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy thought the Lord Chancellor had, upon his own shewing, grossly neglected his duty, and that the House was justified in noticing the case thus early.

Mr. E. Egerton deprecated a premature discussion of the subject, and urged the speedy publication of the evidence.

The Lord Advocate complained of the manner in which this matter had been brought under discussion, and of the groundless charges insinuated against the Lord Chancellor, explaining some of the circumstances which had been pressed against him. The Lord Chancellor, he said, had suffered under imputations which, so far as the purity of his motives was concerned, were most unjust.

Lord Cranbourne, Mr. Denman, Mr. Hennessey, Mr. Ayrton, Sir L. Palk, and Mr. Scully continued the discussion upon incidental points.

Lord Palmerston said, he had listened with pain to the speech of Mr. Longfield, who had not given the Lord Chancellor fair play in his citations of facts. He was pained to hear the bitterness he had thrown into his invectives against the Lord Chancellor, and he complained of the manner in which this discussion had been raised without proper notice.

The motion for adjournment was negatived.

In reply to a question,

Lord Palmerston said, he thought nothing need keep Parliament sitting beyond Thursday week.

Wednesday, June 28.

On the order for the second reading of the Capital Punishments within Gaols Bill, Mr. Hibbert stated that, as the report of the commission on the same subject had not yet been issued, he should withdraw the bill.

The Tests Abolition (Oxford) Bill and the Bank Notes Issue (Scotland) Bill were also withdrawn.

The Clerical Subscription, the Turnpike Acts Continuance, the Colonial Docks, and the Marriages (Lambourne) Bills, were read a third time, and passed.

The Lords' amendments to the following bills were agreed to:—Prisons (Scotland) Act Amendment, Procurators (Scotland), Partnership Amendment, Post Office (Additional Site), Small Benefices (Ireland) Act Amendment, and Locomotives on Roads Bills.

SIR W. HODGKIN'S PRACTICAL TREATISE on the LAW OF RAILWAYS, RAILWAY COMPANIES, and RAILWAY INVESTMENTS. With an Appendix of Statutes, Forms, &c. The Fourth Edition. By CHARLES MANLEY SMITH, Esq., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister at Law.

The great and increasing interest in everything relating to Railways now manifested by the public, have created such a demand for this valuable work, that the Publisher has been induced to have a new Edition of it prepared. This Edition comprises the important Statutes passed in the Session of 1864, as well as the Standing Orders for the Session of 1865, in addition to the numerous Decisions of the Courts, both of Law and Equity, since the last Edition was published, and such of the Rules of the London Stock Exchange as are applicable to Railways, as amended up to 1864. The task of preparing and conducting through the press this new Edition has been a really arduous one; but no pains have been spared by the learned Editor (whose work on the Law of Master and Servant is well known, not only in Westminster Hall, but also in Ireland, Scotland, and America), to make the work complete; and the Publisher believes that he can with confidence recommend it to all persons interested in Railways, especially Directors, Secretaries, and shareholders, as the most complete work on Railway Law yet offered to the public.

The English and Irish Railway Clearing Acts have also been added to this Edition.

THE JURIST.

LONDON, JULY 8, 1865.

THE session of Parliament of 1865 has been unusually barren in the matter of law reform. Attempts have been made to alter and amend the law by the introduction of several bills; but from whatever cause, whether the energies of the Legislature has been impaired in sympathy with its approaching dissolution, or whether the measures proposed are not urgently demanded, and were, therefore, not pressed beyond the walls of Parliament, certain it is that there has been little law legislation, and even those bills which have become law, such as the County Courts Bill, have been so mutilated in their passage through the House as hardly to be recognized by their framers. There is, however, one exception to these remarks, though even that is rather an amendment in process than any substantial change. The act, intitled "An Act for amending the Law of Evidence and Practice on Criminal Trials," which received the royal assent on the 9th May, but the most important clause of which did not come into operation until the first of this month, is a very important measure affecting, as it does, all criminal courts, which, although regarded by the profession in some sense as less important, yet are of the greatest importance to the public, and indeed to the profession as part of the public.

The practice and evidence on the trial of pleas of the Crown differed from that in civil actions in many respects, but the preamble of this act recites, that it is expedient that the law of evidence and practice on trials for felony and misdemeanour, and other proceedings in courts of criminal judicature, should be more nearly assimilated to that on trials at Nisi Prius. At common law, and until the passing of the 7 Will. 3, c. 3, it was a settled rule that no counsel should be allowed to a prisoner upon a trial for treason or felony, unless some point of law arose to be debated; and Lord Coke, in the 3rd Institute, gives as a reason for this, "Because the evidence to convict a prisoner should be so manifest as it cannot be contradicted." It was the custom, however, even in these days, for judges at criminal trials to allow counsel to instruct a prisoner as to what questions to put to the witnesses. The stat. 7 Will. 3, c. 3, provided, that in cases of treason a prisoner might be defended by counsel not exceeding two, but it was not till passing the stat. 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 114, that the old rule on this subject at the trials of felonies and misdemeanours was set aside, and it was by that act provided that all persons tried for any felony, and all accused persons, and in cases of summary convictions, may make answer by their counsel, or in courts where attorneys are allowed to practice as advocates, by attorney. This statute brought the practice to that which existed until the first of this month, when the 28 Vict. c. 18, came into operation, the practice being, as is perfectly well known, for the counsel for the prosecution to state the case against the prisoner, and then to examine the witnesses in support of the indictment. At the close of the case for the prosecution, since the passing of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 114, the counsel for the prisoner addressed the jury, and, if he thought fit, called witnesses; and if he exercised his right to call witnesses, the counsel for the Crown had a right to reply on the evidence. This right, however, has been seldom exercised if the witnesses called for the defence are only witnesses to character. Now, however, by the provision of sect. 2 of the new act, the practice at a trial in a criminal court is assimilated to that in a civil court. That section provides, that "if any prisoner or prisoners, defendant or defendants, shall be defended by counsel, but not otherwise, it shall be the duty of the presiding judge, at the close of the case for the prosecution, to ask the counsel for each prisoner or defendant so defended by counsel, whether he or they intend to adduce evidence; and in the event of none of them thereupon announcing his intention to adduce evidence, the counsel for the prosecution shall be allowed to address the jury a second time in support of his case, for the purpose of summing up the evidence against such prisoner or prisoners, or defendant or defendants; and upon every trial for felony or misdemeanour, whether the prisoners or defendants, or any of them, shall be defended by counsel or not, each and every such prisoner or defendant, or his or their counsel respectively, shall be allowed, if he or they shall think fit, to open his or their case or cases respectively; and after the conclusion of such opening, or of all such openings, if more than one, such prisoner or prisoners, or defendant or defendants, or their counsel, shall be entitled to examine such witnesses as he or they may think fit, and when all the evidence is concluded, to sum up the evidence respectively; and the right of reply, and practice and course of proceedings, save as hereby altered, shall be as at present." It cannot be questioned that there are a class of criminal trials where this alteration in the law of proceeding in the trial of felonies and misdemeanours will be very beneficial. It occasionally happens that there is a real and substantial answer to a charge on the merits, even when it has proceeded so far as to trial. It sometimes happens that there is an answer in point of law to a charge of felony or misdemeanour; but it is difficult to say how, when the defence relies on the law, the ends of justice will be benefited. But in the great number of cases, as is well known to any practitioner who has frequented criminal courts, there is really no answer to the charge; the only question being, whether the case for the prosecution is made out sufficiently to satisfy the minds of twelve reasonable men. We have said above that it is not usual to exercise the right to reply where the counsel for a prisoner only calls witnesses to character. It is, however, usual and necessary to cross-examine such witnesses; for it frequently happens that the witness, although speaking the truth, has known nothing of the accused for so long a time previous to the commission of the offence charged, as to amount to no evidence of character; and where such witnesses are called, it may be necessary to point out to the jury the fact, that the evidence is of no value; and this counsel may do in reply. The act provides, that the case for the defence is to be opened by counsel, but counsel for a prisoner will often find it difficult to obtain materials for a speech, except a general comment on the case for the prosecution. The efforts of counsel are principally directed to endeavour to discover some flaw in the case for the prosecution. Probably, excepting the summing up of counsel for the Crown, the practice will remain much the same as at present, because counsel who have been in the habit of appearing for prisoners are well aware how dangerous it generally is to call witnesses on behalf of prisoners. We need only refer to the late trial of "Müller" for murder, at the Central Criminal Court, where the counsel could hardly have abstained from adducing the evidence set up for the prisoner, yet, in fact, it rather assisted the case for the prosecution. At all events, the counsel for the prosecution will have the right, and will probably generally exercise it, to make two speeches. Probably a right to reply in the strict sense will, as now, rarely be given. Sect. 3 of the act provides, that a party shall not be allowed to impeach the credit of his own witness, by general evidence of bad character, but he may, if the judge shall be of opinion that the witness is adverse, either contradict him, or, by leave of the judge, prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present statement; but before this can be done the witness must be referred to the particular circumstances when he made a different statement, and he must be asked whether he did make such statement. The question whether an inquiry into the general character of a witness should be restricted to his reputation for veracity, or might even be in general terms, involving his entire moral character, was not definitely settled; but now in a criminal proceeding it is clear that such inquiry cannot extend to the witness's general character, but either party may, by leave of the judge, call other evidence to contradict even his own witness, having first called the attention of such witness to the particular occasion when he made the statement alleged to be inconsistent with his present statement. Sect. 4 gives the opposite party, in cross-examining a witness, the same power of calling other witnesses to contradict such witness, having first called such witness's attention to the particular circumstances under which the supposed contradictory statement was made. It would manifestly have been most unjust to contradict a witness by the evidence of another witness, until his memory had been called to the particular circumstances under which he made a different statement. Indeed, in practice it might often be a waste of time to call another witness, when, if explained to the witness before the Court, he might state circumstances reconciling the two statements. Sect. 5 provides, that a witness may be cross-examined as to previous statements made by him in writing, or which have been reduced into writing, relative to the subject-matter of the indictment, without such writing being shewn to him; but if it is intended to contradict such witness by such writing, his attention must first be called to the parts of the writing which are to be used to contradict him.

This is a material alteration in the mode of contradicting a witness's evidence, because in The Queen's case (2 B. & B. 289), which has ever since been an authority upon this subject, it was held, that in cross-examining a witness, you cannot state to the witness the contents of the writing, and then ask him whether he ever wrote such a statement; but you must shew him the writing, and ask him whether it be in his handwriting, and if he admit it, you may give it in evidence; but if he deny that he wrote it, you cannot go further. The ordinary way in which this point arises is, when the witness had made a different statement before the magistrates; but it was one of the express conclusions come to by the judges after the passing of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 114, that a prisoner's counsel, in cross-examining a witness, could not cross-examine as to what he had said before the magistrates; but that the deposition must be put in evidence, and read, and that then the counsel for the prisoner might proceed with the cross-examination of the witness as to any contradiction or variance. It would seem that, under the new act, it will only be necessary to call the attention of the witness to the previous statement or deposition, and then to cross-examine him as to any variance. This will be a material gain to the defence, because it will not be necessary to make the statement evidence for the prisoner, and thereby give the counsel for the prosecution a right to reply. Formerly it was held, that a question put to a witness for the purpose of impeaching his character could not be put, unless directly material to the issue; at all events, several old dicta shew that a witness was not bound to answer such a question; and Lord Ellenborough is reported, in Millman v. Tucker (Pea. Add. C. 222), to have said, that a witness was not bound to state whether he had been sentenced to imprisonment in a house of correction; but now, by sect. 6 of the new act, a witness may be questioned as to whether he has been convicted of felony or misdemeanour, and if he denies, or does not admit, the fact, or refuses to answer the question, it shall be lawful for the cross-examining party to prove such conviction. Sect. 7 provides, that "it shall not be necessary to prove by an attesting witness any instrument to the validity of which attestation is not requisite, and such instrument may be proved as if there had been no attesting witness thereto." Sect. 8 provides, "that comparison of any disputed writing with writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writing, and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the Court and jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute." It may be a question whether this will be permitted where, as in forgery, the genuineness of the writing is the very issue to be tried. These six sections are, in fact, only an application of the sects. 22 to 26, inclusive, of the Common-law Procedure Act, 1854, to the procedure and practice in criminal courts. They have been found to work well in civil courts, and it is only the jealousy with which any attempt at change is introduced into criminal proceedings which has postponed their universal adoption. Lastly, we may add, for the information of some of our readers, that by the interpretation clause of the act, the word "counsel" is to apply to attorneys in all cases where, by the practice of the Court, attorneys are allowed to practice as advocates. On the whole, we think the act a beneficial change in the law. It remains to be seen whether sect. 2 creates any change in the practice at a criminal trial, beyond making the trial so much longer, as counsel for the prosecution think fit to make their second speech.

A GREAT name passing into retirement demands a brief obituary notice. Richard Bethell distinguished himself at college by that love of acquisition which he still retains. Early in his career at the bar he was honoured by the patronage of a London agency firm, remarkable alike for the extent of their business and their mode of conducting it. When but a rising junior, and before any material amendment had been effected in procedure either at law or in equity, Mr. Bethell took the first step towards the fusion of law and equity, by importing into Chancery practice the subtle strategy of special pleading and the adroit manoeuvres of Nisi Prius advocacy. His ability as a pleader and his skill in dealing with evidence were conspicuous. No advocate had a greater command over facts. His statement of his client's case, and even his reading from the evidence in the cause, would enchain the attention, and often extort the admiration and astonishment, of his adversaries and the Court—as if it were a romance; and his references to facts and to authorities were generally more closely followed than his arguments on legal principles, though these were frequently novel in the highest degree. In due time he became the acknowledged leader of the Chancery Bar, and now the native modesty and gentleness of his character shone out in his invariably courteous and considerate demeanour towards the junior bar.

We reserve the consideration of his merits as a judge and as a patron, for separate notices; but it is in connexion with law reform that his name will chiefly be remembered. In 1857, by his vigorous but conciliatory advocacy of Lord Cranworth's bill for a Divorce Court, he mainly contributed to the passing of that measure, which has done so much for the peace and security of the domestic hearth, and, with the aid of the penny press, has incidentally driven the literature of Holywell-street and Paris out of the market, by providing pure and instructive reading for every home. In 1860 he attempted a great work—the consolidation and amendment of the bankruptcy and insolvency laws—but the merits of his bill were not appreciated—and in the following year, abandoning consolidation, he succeeded in passing the Bankruptcy Amendment Act, which has worked so admirably, and has given so much satisfaction. Not relaxing in his endeavours, in 1862, he introduced and passed the Title to Real Estates Act, which has provided comfortable incomes and abundant leisure for several deserving officials. In introducing that measure, he informed the House of Lords he was at once the inventor and the perfecter of the plan of a registry of title; and as a ground of confidence in the proposal of a warranty of titles, he made the following effective statement:—That while during the last quarter of a century a million of purchases of land have been made for railway purposes, subject to the obligation of paying for any dormant interests that may have been overlooked, "yet so few are the instances of that kind which have occurred, that I hardly venture to mention the number, but it should seem too inconsiderable to be credited. I believe that not more than a dozen discoveries of latent interests have been made during the last twenty-five years." This is a fair example of the care and industry with which this conscientious reformer was accustomed to collect, and the scrupulous accuracy with which he set forth, the statistics upon which his measures were based. Any ordinary person, however well versed in railway matters, if he were asked—how many bad titles have railway companies taken? might reply—Who can tell? The names of their advisers are legion; and there are no records. This does not deter Lord Westbury; he wants the fact, and he gets it. His act for giving to the county courts equitable jurisdiction to ten times the amount of their legal jurisdiction has been the last gift of that fine logical mind to an ungrateful country; for "the consolidation of the statute law, by which it has been reduced from forty-four volumes to ten," is still only a dream. Even if he should not fulfil his promise of continuing to reform the law, his worst enemies must admit that he has, at least, left it in such a state that his successors will find no difficulty in amending it.

Into the privacy of his domestic virtues we will not intrude, but we may remark, that the accounts which testify his kindly regard for the interests of his relations and friends are public property—graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday, July 3.

The Crown Suits, &c. Amendment Bill and the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, were read a third time.

The Penalties Law Amendment Bill passed through committees.

Tuesday, July 4.

Lord Redesdale took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock. The Lord Chancellor was not present.

MR. WINSLOW.

Lord Chelmsford adverted to the answer given on the previous evening in the House of Commons by the Attorney-General to a question with reference to the pension granted to Mr. Winslow, a master in lunacy. His Lordship stated that Mr. Winslow had fallen into pecuniary difficulties, and, amongst other things, had borrowed a considerable sum of money from the keeper of a lunatic asylum. In consequence of this he was unable to come to his office. On finding this to be the case, he (Lord Chelmsford) called upon Mr. Winslow to attend to his duties or to resign. Mr. Winslow desired to make it a condition of his resignation that he should receive a pension; but he (Lord Chelmsford) told him distinctly that he must not look for any pension; and eventually, Mr. Winslow resigned unconditionally. Not only, therefore, had he (Lord Chelmsford) done nothing to promote the creation of any vacancy by the resignation of Mr. Winslow, but he had done all that he could to discourage it. He was the more anxious to clear up this matter because the vacancy which arose by the retirement of Mr. Winalow was the one which he filled up by the appointment of his son-in-law, a gentleman of great ability and of the highest character. The noble Lord then stated that he had since refused to represent to the Lord Chancellor that Mr. Winalow had retired on account of ill health, because this was not the fact. He admitted that he had written to Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, stating that he should be glad if the Lord Chancellor could see any grounds on which he could feel it his duty to grant Mr. Winalow a pension.

RESIGNATION OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

Earl Granville.—My Lords, you are aware, not only by rumour, but officially from the proceedings of the other House of Parliament being communicated to your Lordships, that a resolution was last night adopted by the House of Commons in regard to the Lord Chancellor. It would not only be irregular, but it would be unbecoming in me, to make any comments on that resolution; but I think it my duty to inform you that the Lord Chancellor has requested Lord Palmerston to tender his resignation to her Majesty of the post which he now holds, and Lord Palmerston has done so. It may be right that I should state, that for some months the Lord Chancellor has pressed on Lord Palmerston the resignation of his office, stating, that while he believed the accusations made against him to be ill-founded, yet he thought it might be injurious to the Government and to the profession that he should hold so high and distinguished a position while any suspicion rested upon him. Lord Palmerston, with his (Earl Granville's) complete concurrence, urged Lord Westbury, from time to time to withdraw his resignation. He thought that he should wait until the fullest investigation had taken place. After the expression of the opinion of the House of Commons which took place on the previous evening, the Lord Chancellor had repeated the tender of his resignation, and Lord Palmerston thought it right to advise the Government that the resignation should be accepted. It was, however, for the convenience of the public that the Lord Chancellor should retain the seals until after the prorogation of Parliament.

Wednesday, July 3.

The royal assent was given, by commission, to 213 bills. Among them were the Marriages (Lambourne), Partnership Amendment, Carriers Act Amendment, County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction, Record of Title (Ireland), Land Debentures (Ireland), Clerical Subscription, Poor-law Board Continuance, Navy and Marines (Property of Deceased), and Expiring Laws Continuance bills.

At five o'clock the Lord Chancellor entered, and took his seat upon the woolsack. Amid profound silence,

The Lord Chancellor rose and said—My Lords, I have deemed it my duty, out of the deep respect I owe to your Lordships, to attend here to-day that I may in person announce to you that I tendered the resignation of my office yesterday to her Majesty, and that it has been by her Majesty most graciously accepted. My Lords, the step which I took yesterday only, I should have taken several months ago, if I had followed the dictates of my own judgment, and acted on my own views alone. But I felt that I was not at liberty to do so. As a member of the Government I could not take such a step without the permission and sanction of the Government. As far as I was myself personally concerned, possessing, as I had the happiness to do, the friendship of the noble lord at the head of the Government, and of the members of the cabinet, I laid aside my own feelings, being satisfied that my honour and my sense of duty would be safe if I followed their opinion rather than my own. My Lords, I believe that the holder of the Great Seal ought never to be in the position of an accused person, and such, unfortunately, being the case, for my own part, I felt it due to the great office that I held, that I should retire from it, and meet any accusation in the character of a private person. But my noble friend at the head of the Government combated that view, and I think with great justice. He said it would not do to admit this as a principle of political conduct, for the consequence would be, that whoever brought up an accusation would at once succeed in driving the Lord Chancellor from office. But when the charges were first raised that were investigated by a committee of your Lordships, I did deem it my duty to tender my resignation, and the answer which I then received, and to the prudence of which I gave my assent, was that answer of my noble friend which I have just described to you. When the committee was appointed in the House of Commons, I deemed it to be my duty, acting upon the same principle, once more to tender my resignation; but on this occasion, also, I deferred to the objections raised by the noble friend whom I have already mentioned. Again, when notice was given of the late motion in the House of Commons, I begged that that motion might be rendered unnecessary by my resignation being announced. But my noble friend thought it was my duty still to persevere, and, accordingly, my Lords, my resignation, earnestly as I wished it to be accepted, was postponed in the manner I have described to you until yesterday. Let it not be for one moment supposed that I say this in order to set up my own opinion in opposition to the kind feeling which I experienced, and the judicious advice which I received, coming, as they did, from one whom I was bound to respect, and to whose authority I felt called upon to defer. I have made this statement, my Lords, simply in the hope that you will believe, and that the public will believe, that I have not clung to office, much less that I have been influenced by any base or more unworthy motive. With regard to the opinion which the House of Commons has pronounced, I do not presume to say a word. I am bound to accept the decision. I may, however, express the hope that after an interval of time calmer thoughts will prevail, and a more favourable view be taken of my conduct. I am thankful for the opportunity which my tenure of office has afforded me to propose and pass measures which have received your Lordships' approbation, and which I believe—may, I will venture from experience to predict—will be productive of great benefit to the country. With these measures I hope my name will be associated. I regret deeply that a great measure which I had at heart—I refer to the formation of a digest of the whole law—I have been unable to inaugurate; for it was not until this session that the means were afforded by Parliament for that purpose. That great scheme, my Lords, I bequeath already prepared to the hands of my successor. As to the future, I can only venture to promise that it will be my anxious endeavour, in the character of a private member of your Lordships' House, to promote and assist in the accomplishment of all these reforms and improvements in the administration of justice which I feel yet remain to be carried out. I may add, in reference to the appellate jurisdiction of your Lordships' House, that I am happy to say it is left in a state which will, I think, be found to be satisfactory. There will not be at the close of the session a single judgment in arrears, save one in which the arguments, after occupying several days, were brought to a conclusion only the day before yesterday. In the Court of Chancery, I am glad to be able to inform your Lordships, I do not think there will remain at the end of this week one appeal unheard, or one judgment undelivered. I mention these things simply to shew, that it has been my earnest desire, from the moment I assumed the seals of office, to devote all the energies I possessed, and all the industry of which I was capable, to the public service. My Lords, it only remains for me to thank you, which I do most sincerely, for the kindness which I have uniformly received at your hands. It is very possible, that by some word inadvertently used—some abruptness of manner—I may have given pain, or exposed myself to your unfavourable opinion. If that be so, I beg of you to accept the sincere expression of my regret, while I indulge in the hope that the circumstance may be erased from your memories. I have no more to say, my Lords, except to thank you for the kindness with which you have listened to these observations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday, July 3.

The Foreign Jurisdiction Act Amendment Bill passed the committee.

Mr. Hunt moved the following resolution:—

"That the evidence taken before the committee of this House on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court discloses that a great facility exists for obtaining public appointments by corrupt means; that such evidence, and also that taken before a committee of the House of Lords in the case of Leonard Edmund, and laid before this House, shews a laxity of practice and want of caution on the part of the Lord Chancellor, in sanctioning the grant of retiring pensions to public officers over whose heads grave charges are impending, and in filling up the vacancies made by the retirement of such officers, whereby great encouragement has been given to corrupt practices; and that such laxity and want of caution, even in the absence of any improper motive, are, in the opinion of this House, highly reprehensible, and calculated to throw discredit on the administration of the high offices of State."

He began by acknowledging the importance of the motion which he had undertaken to propose to the House, the effect of it being no less than a vote of censure upon one of the highest functionaries of the State. He then proceeded to establish the proposition upon which his resolution was founded. He read the evidence relating to the transactions between Mr. Welch and the Hon. R. Bethell, and the case of Mr. Wilde, connecting this evidence by dates with that taken in the Edmunds' case, pointing out, on the one hand, the contradictions in the former evidence, and, on the other, the proof of actual payments of money, and of what he termed the "hocus pocus" in which Mr. Miller was concerned. He then examined the evidence as to the Lord Chancellor's "laxity of practice" and "want of caution," observing that he ought to have known that Mr. Miller was in his son's interest, and that this knowledge should have aroused his suspicions; and the mere fact that Mr. Welch had been recommended by his son Richard Bethell, should have caused him to pause before he gave him a public appointment. He did not mean that the Lord Chancellor was aware of the corrupt transactions that were going on, but he had been guilty of great and wilful neglect. Mr. Hunt then reviewed a portion of the evidence which affected Mr. Skirrow, Mr. Richard Bethell, and Mr. Welch, with a knowledge of the corrupt transactions, and as to the extraordinary step of Mr. Miller with reference to the expected appointment of Mr. R. Bethell, laying stress upon dates and upon collateral facts, again charging the Lord Chancellor with supineness and want of vigilance for the public interest, as further manifested in the grant of pensions to Mr. Edmunds and Mr. Wilde.

The Lord Advocate, adverting to the groundless imputations which had been cast upon the Lord Chancellor, observed that it was difficult to get rid of the prejudice they created, and he entreated the House to listen, as a judicial tribunal, impartially, to what he should urge on his behalf. He examined the evidence relating to Mr. Wilde and the appointment of Mr. Welch, entering minutely into its details, replying as he proceeded to the remarks of Mr. Longfield and Mr. Hunt. He insisted that, on the face of the evidence, it was absurd to suppose that Mr. Richard Bethell could have exercised the influence alleged upon his father, and maintained that the recommendations of Mr. Welch were amply sufficient to justify his appointment. He discussed the case of Mr. Wilde and the conduct of Mr. Miller in reference to it, remarking that it was very easy now, when all the surrounding circumstances were known, to apply line and rule, and blame the Lord Chancellor for allowing a retiring pension to an officer. He alluded to the confusion in the evidence of Mr. Miller, and compared it with that of other witnesses with reference to the case of Mr. Wilde, reminding the House that the enforced resignation of his office was a punishment inflicted upon Mr. Wilde. The House should not express a stronger opinion in regard to the Lord Chancellor's conduct in this matter than that of the committee. With reference to the corrupt transactions in relation to Mr. Welch's appointment, he contended that there was not the most remote connexion between them and the motives which had led to the appointment, citing portions of the evidence to justify the conclusion that the Lord Chancellor stood thoroughly clear of any ignoble motive in the matter. He moved an amendment to the effect that the House, having considered the report of the select committee on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court, and the evidence upon which it was founded, agree with the committee in acquitting the Lord Chancellor of all charge, except haste and want of caution in granting a pension to Mr. Wilde; and is of opinion that further steps should be taken by law with reference to the grant of such pensions.

Mr. Hennessy observed that the amendment related to only one of the cases; it said not a word of the Edmunds' case, which was by far the worst, for it appeared from the evidence taken by the Lords' committee that other members of the Government besides the Lord Chancellor were cognisant of certain matters relating to that case. He read extracts of the evidence to that effect; and as to the grant of a pension to Mr. Edmunds, the material facts known to members of the Government were, he said, concealed from the committee, and he insisted that the report of the committee, condemning the Lord Chancellor, was condemnatory of the Government. With reference to the Leeds case, he accused the Attorney-General of misleading the House.

Mr. Denman, without any inditement to be a champion of the Lord Chancellor, said that, having read the evidence through, he was of opinion that the heads of the resolution were unjust and untrue. After replying to Mr. Hennessy's remarks upon the Edmunds' case, and referring to the acquittal of the Lord Chancellor by the Lords' committee of any corrupt motive, he applied himself to the Leeds' Court case. He contended that the testimonials produced by Mr. Welch were sufficient to justify his appointment; and as to Mr. Wilde's case, he thought the strongest evidence was contained in the candid statement of the Lord Chancellor himself, that he did not read the certificate, which, if a grave offence, was one committed by judges every day. Mr. Miller's evidence was contradicted by that of other witnesses and by his own. The suggestion, that there had been a plot to place Mr. Richard Bethell in the Leeds Court, was utterly groundless as far as the Lord Chancellor was concerned.

Mr. Bouverie avowed a want of confidence in the Lord Chancellor in the administration of his office. He concurred with the committee in putting aside all questions of corruption on his part; but there were corrupt practices going on in offices connected with him, though he was not cognisant of them, which the House was bound to notice and condemn. There had been gross malpractices on the part of officers in the Court of Bankruptcy, and he considered that the Lord Chancellor had been guilty of a dereliction of duty in granting retiring pensions without inquiry.

Mr. Hunt offered to allow his resolution to be negatived, in order to let in a resolution of which Mr. Bouverie had given notice, more distinctly exculpating the Lord Chancellor from any charge of corruption.

After a few remarks by Mr. Hoares and Mr. Vivian,

The Attorney-General observed, that the amendment proposed by the Lord Advocate in express terms affirmed the decision of the committee, with the addition that it was expedient that this class of pensions should, like other pensions, be referred to the guardians of the public purse. He contended that there was no ground for a vote of want of confidence in the Lord Chancellor, to drive him from his office, and he complained of the observations of Mr. Bouverie, who had prejudged the case, in pronouncing sentence upon those who he said had been guilty of gross malpractices in the bankruptcy offices. He admitted that the Lord Chancellor did commit an error in the Edmunds' case, but the time for visiting that error had gone by, and it was unjust to tack on that case to the case of Mr. Wilde. He reminded the House of the abuses which had been ferreted out by the vigilance of the Lord Chancellor, of the odium he had incurred by these services rendered to the country, and of the manner in which he had exercised his high judicial patronage. These considerations should weigh with the House, which, in looking at the slight offences charged against the Lord Chancellor, would say—

"Non ego paucis

Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura."

Mr. E. Egerton thought the Attorney-General would have done better if he had left the case as it stood in the report of the committee.

Mr. Henley could not agree with the original resolution, but would be ready to vote for Mr. Bouverie's amendment.

After a few words from Colonel Pennant, the original resolution was negatived.

The amendment of the Lord Advocate being put as a substantive motion, Lord Palmerston, observing that the House had negatived any charge of corruption against the Lord Chancellor, recommended and moved that the debate be adjourned till tomorrow (Tuesday).

Mr. Diersack opposed this motion, which was negatived, upon a division, by 177 to 166.

The Lord Advocate's motion having been negatived, Mr. Bouverie moved his amendment as a substantive motion, which was agreed to.

Tuesday, July 4.

Lord Palmerston rose, and said—Sir, it is quite right that I should inform the House that the Chancellor, in deference to the vote of the House of last night, and to the expressed opinion which that vote implied, has felt it his duty to tender her Majesty, through me, the resignation of his office, which accordingly I have done. I think it at the same time due to the Chancellor to state, that as early as the beginning of the session—the beginning of the year, I may say—the Chancellor, stung in his feelings by the various attacks which were made upon him from different quarters, often pressed upon me that his resignation should be conveyed to her Majesty. I, upon public, private, and personal grounds, declined to accept that resignation, or to be the channel of conveying that resignation. I urged upon the Chancellor to remain at his post, for this reason, that if he had resigned in consequence of the various attacks—some of them anonymous—he would thereby have been considered as implying an admission of the various charges made against him, and even more than the charges which were actually made; whereas I represented to him, that if he remained at his post, there would undoubtedly be a Parliamentary inquiry into the matters concerned; and knowing and believing that his motives throughout have been perfectly pure and incorrupt, I was convinced that out of that inquiry would result that which has resulted—an entire acquittal of the Chancellor of every corrupt motive. It will be necessary that he should continue to hold the seals until Friday morning, in order to go through those operations connected with the prorogation and dissolution of Parliament, and on Friday the Chancellor will resign the seals into the hands of her Majesty.

CHITTY'S COLLECTION OF STATUTES.

Now ready, in 4 very thick vols., price 12l. 12s. cloth.

A COLLECTION of all the STATUTES of PRACTICAL UTILITY, with Notes thereon; intended as a Circuit and Court Companion. The Third Edition, containing all the Statutes of Practical Utility in the Civil and Criminal Administration of Justice to the present time. By W. N. WELSBY and EDWARD BEAVAN, Esqrs., Barristers at Law.

"The principal branches of the Law are arranged alphabetically, and under each is collected all the Statutes relating to it, with explanatory notes. Besides the easy access afforded by the alphabetical arrangement of the subjects, a very copious general index supplies the means of ready reference to all the subjects of lesser importance to which the various Statutes are directed."

"We could not say more for this great work by any words of approbation than by this short description of it. It is an admirable design admirably executed."—Law Times, May 13, 1855.

"* In the debate on the proposed consolidation of the Statutes, on the 9th February, 1854, Lord Campbell said, 'that the Statutes at large extended to about fifty volumes folio, but all the Statutes which were usually required by lawyers for reference might be found in three octavo volumes, compiled by his learned friend Mr. Welsby. When he (Lord Campbell) was upon the Bench, he always had this work by him, and no Statutes were ever referred to by the Bar which he could not find in it.'"

The Lord Advocate's motion having been negatived, Mr. Bouverie moved his amendment as a substantive motion, which was agreed to.

Tuesday, July 4.

Lord Palmerston rose, and said—Sir, it is quite right that I should inform the House that the Chancellor, in deference to the vote of the House of last night, and to the expressed opinion which that vote implied, has felt it his duty to tender her Majesty, through me, the resignation of his office, which accordingly I have done. I think it at the same time due to the Chancellor to state, that as early as the beginning of the session—the beginning of the year, I may say—the Chancellor, stung in his feelings by the various attacks which were made upon him from different quarters, often pressed upon me that his resignation should be conveyed to her Majesty. I, upon public, private, and personal grounds, declined to accept that resignation, or to be the channel of conveying that resignation. I urged upon the Chancellor to remain at his post, for this reason, that if he had resigned in consequence of the various attacks—some of them anonymous—he would thereby have been considered as implying an admission of the various charges made against him, and even more than the charges which were actually made; whereas I represented to him, that if he remained at his post, there would undoubtedly be a Parliamentary inquiry into the matters concerned; and knowing and believing that his motives throughout have been perfectly pure and incorrupt, I was convinced that out of that inquiry would result that which has resulted—an entire acquittal of the Chancellor of every corrupt motive. It will be necessary that he should continue to hold the seals until Friday morning, in order to go through those operations connected with the prorogation and dissolution of Parliament, and on Friday the Chancellor will resign the seals into the hands of her Majesty.

PETTY SESSIONS PRACTICE.

STONE'S PRACTICE OF PETTY SESSIONS.

With the Statutes, a List of Summary Convictions, and an Appendix of Forms. Seventh Edition. By THOMAS BELL and LEWIS W. CAVE, Esqrs., Barristers at Law. With a Supplement, bringing the Statutes and Cases up to 1863. 12mo., price 18s. cloth.

"It is remarkable for a rare combination of conciseness and clearness in the composition, which have recommended it to magistrates who have not been educated as lawyers, and to whom, therefore, the books written for the use of lawyers are often obscure by reason of their technicalities. The present editors have preserved this characteristic of Mr. Stone's volume in their own abundant additions to it."—Law Times.
